The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d instant, I herewith transmit the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which affords all the information required by said resolution. The President begs leave to add, that he trusts all facilities will be given to this exploring expedition that Congress can bestow, and the honor of the nation demands.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, Feb. 6, 1837.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, the message was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, in relation to our affairs with Mexico:

[See Senate proceedings of yesterday.]

The message having been read,

On motion of Mr. CAMERLENG, it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications:

1. A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the general returns of the militia of the United States, of their arms, accoutrements, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. THOMPSON of Ohio, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

2. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of a resolution of the House of the 3d of January, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the correspondence between the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Land Office at Fort Wayne, Indiana; which, on motion of Mr. McCARTY, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

3. 4. A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Third Auditor, on the subject of our intercourse with the Indian tribes.

Mr. GRENELL moved that this communication be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the further consideration of this communication be postponed until to-morrow, which was agreed to.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. EVERETT, this vote was reconsidered, and the communication was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

5. A communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, showing the number of persons engaged in that service, with the compensation paid to each; which, on motion of Mr. GRENELL, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the select committee, appointed to examine into the condition of the Executive Departments, by leave of the House, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee of the House, appointed under the resolution of the 17th January last, be authorized to direct the printing of as many copies of the journal of their proceedings, as they may think proper for the use of the members, to be laid on the table with the report of the committee.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to amend the resolution by inserting that the number of copies to be printed shall not exceed 1000; which was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such portions of annuities to the Missouri band of the Sac and Fox nation of Indians, as may appear due to them under the several treaties of 1804, 1824 and 1832, and of granting to them such other relief as the circumstances attending their application for payment may appear just and proper.

Mr. JARVIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill relating to pensions chargeable on the navy pension fund; read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. INGERSOLL stated that he had been appointed one of the tellers on the part of the House appointed to count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and that he, finding it would be impossible for him to be present at the meeting of the two houses, therefore asked to be excused and that another be appointed in his place, which was agreed to.

WAREHOUSING SYSTEM.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to authorize merchandise to be deposited in the public stores, and for other purposes: read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

DEBENTURES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the same committee, also reported a bill repealing a provision in the act of the 14th July, 1832, entitled an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, and for reducing the limitation on debentures: read twice, and laid over.

[The provision of the act proposed to be repealed by this bill, is the one making it the duty of the collector to have the goods sold when the duties are due; and restores the old act, which allowed them to remain in the public stores for nine months and one month for advertising; in other words, ten months.]

Mr. PATTON, from the Joint Committee on the Library, reported a bill to continue the provision for the increase and improvement of the law library of Congress: read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Tudor, junior: read twice and committed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of certain Tennessee volunteers: read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the same committee, also reported a bill providing for paying three companies of militia enlisted in the State of Indiana, and called into the service of the United States: read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MUEHLENBERG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported Senate bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Dr. John Ramsay, deceased, without amendment; which was committed.

Mr. MUEHLENBERG, from the same committee, also reported Senate bill, without amendment, for the relief of James M'Crory, which was committed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a resolution ordering the report and accompanying documents in relation to certain surveys in the State of Maine to be printed for the use of the House, which was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. JARVIS, the Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the resolution adopted by the House of the 3d Feb, relative to an examination of Georges Bank, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of forming an artificial island; and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported without amendment, Senate bill, entitled an act to authorize the Secretary of War to adjust and pay to Benjamin Murphy, of Arkansas, the value of his corn, cattle, and hogs, taken by the Cherokee Indians in the month of December, 1826; which was committed.

Mr. STOKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Christopher Denison: read twice and committed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

This being the day specially set apart by a joint resolution for the two Houses to convene in joint meeting, for the purpose of opening and counting the electoral votes given by the several States for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. HAYNES said, as the hour had nearly elapsed, he begged to propound an inquiry to the Chair, in relation to the order in which the Senate should be received by the House, on occasions like the present.

The CHAIR stated in reply that the usual course had heretofore been for the House, some short time before the arrival of the hour, to send a message to the Senate, informing that body that the House was in readiness to receive them, and count the votes. The Chair stated further that, so far as he had been informed, the mode of receiving the Senate by the House, was for the members to stand uncovered.

Mr. PATTON moved that, while the votes were being counted, ladies be admitted to the privilege of the floor of the Hall.

Mr. JARVIS objected.

Mr. CALHOUN of Massachusetts, moved a suspension of the rule: agreed to—yeas 141, noes not counted; and Mr. PATTON's motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. ANTHONY inquired if it was necessary to move that a committee wait upon the Senate, and, if so, whether the chairman of the Select Committee on the subject should appoint a sub-committee, or the Speaker of the House?

The CHAIR stated in reply, that upon every occasion of this kind, with a single exception, the invariable course had been to send a message to the Senate by the Clerk. In one instance only the message had been transmitted by a committee of two members of the House, who were also appointed to conduct the Senate into the Hall, but that was a departure from the former practice.

Mr. ANTHONY moved that a message be then sent to the Senate by the Clerk, notifying that body that the House was in readiness to receive them, and count the votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The CHAIR stated, that before putting the question, that the seats on the right of the Speaker's chair had been provided for the accommodation of the Senate, and others provided for the members to which they belonged.

Mr. ANTHONY's motion was then put and agreed to.

The Clerk accordingly left the House, the Senate shortly after entered the hall with the President of the Senate, the Hon. WILLIAM R. KING, of Alabama, at their head, preceded by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-arms of the Senate, and were received at the door of the hall, and conducted to the seat assigned them by the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, all the members being uncovered and rising in their places.

When the Senators had taken the seats assigned them, and the President of the Senate had seated himself at the right of the Speaker, the tellers took their seats at the Clerk's table.

The tellers were, for the Senate:

The Hon. FELIX GRUNDY.

For the House of Representatives:

The Hon. FRANCIS THOMAS,

The Hon. LEVI LINCOLN.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE then rose and said: The two Houses being now convened for the purpose of counting the electoral votes of the several States for President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate will, in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, proceed to open the votes and deliver them to the tellers, in order that they may be counted.

I now present to the tellers the electoral vote of the State of Maine.

The tellers then counted the votes, and announced them as follows, severally, in their order, the same form having been observed in every case: the tellers also reading the qualifications of the electors, and the certificates of their elections:

Number of electors appointed in each State	States.	For President.					Vice President.
10	Maine,	10					10
7	New Hampshire,	7					7
14	Massachusetts,	14					14
4	Rhode Island,	4					4
7	Connecticut,	7					7
42	New York,	42					42
5	New Jersey,	5					5
30	Pennsylvania,	30					30
3	Delaware,	3					3
10	Maryland,	10					10
23	Virginia,	23					23
15	North Carolina,	15					15
11	South Carolina,	11					11
11	Georgia,	11					11
15	Kentucky,	15					15
15	Tennessee,	15					15
21	Ohio,	21					21
5	Louisiana,	5					5
4	Mississippi,	4					4
9	Indiana,	9					9
5	Illinois,	5					5
7	Alabama,	7					7
4	Missouri,	4					4
3	Arkansas,	3					3
3	Michigan,	3					3
294	Whole number of electors, were the vote of Michigan counted.	176	14	73	11	26	147	77	47	23
148	Necessary, were the votes of Michigan counted.
291	Whole number of electors, were the votes of Michigan not counted.	167	14	73	11	26	144	77	47	23

THE PRESIDENT of the Senate then announced the result, as reported by the tellers, as follows:

FOR PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

For MARTIN VAN BUREN of New York—
If the votes of Michigan be counted 170
If the votes of Michigan be not counted 167
For WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON of Ohio 73
For HUGH LAWSON WHITE of Tennessee 36
For DANIEL WEBSTER of Massachusetts 14
For WILLIE P. MANGUM of North Carolina 11

It therefore appears, continued the PRESIDENT, that, were the votes of Michigan to be counted, the result would be for MARTIN VAN BUREN, for President of the United States, 170 votes; if the votes of Michigan be not counted, MARTIN VAN BUREN then has 167 votes. In either event MARTIN VAN BUREN of New York is elected PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and I therefore declare that MARTIN VAN BUREN, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing the fourth day of March, 1837.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then announced the votes for Vice President of the United States, as reported by the tellers, as follows:

For RICHARD M. JOHNSON of Kentucky,
If the votes of Michigan be counted 147
If the votes of Michigan be not counted 144
For FRANCIS GRANGER of New York 77
For JOHN TYLER of Virginia 47
For WILLIAM SMITH of Alabama 23

It therefore appears, continued the President, that, were the votes of Michigan counted, the highest number of votes for Vice President of the United States would be 147, and if those votes be not counted, the highest number of votes for that office will be 144. But, in either event no person has received a majority of the electoral votes for Vice President of the United States, and I do therefore declare that no person having received such majority, no person has been elected to that office; that RICHARD M. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and FRANCIS GRANGER of New York, are the two highest on the list, and it now devolves on the Senate of the United States, as provided in the Constitution, from those two persons to elect a Vice President of the United States.

He then announced that the object for which the two Houses were assembled under the Constitution had been accomplished, and that the Senators would retire to their chamber in order.

The Senators then rose and retired in the order they came, the members of the House rising in their places and remaining uncovered.

Mr. THOMAS, from the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported:

That the Joint Committee, in further execution of the duties with which they were charged by the two Houses of Congress, have agreed to the following resolution, in which their committee recommend to the House of Representatives to concur:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on MARTIN VAN BUREN of New York, and notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States, for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1837.

The above resolution having been concurred in,
On motion of Mr. GLASCOCK,
The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, February 9, 1837.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate have, in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution, chosen RICHARD M. JOHNSON of Kentucky Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the fourth of March next.

Mr. SWIFT presented a petition from sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALHOUN objected to the reception of the petition, and Mr. BROWN moved to lay the question of reception on the table; which motion was agreed to—yeas 25, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Wall, and Webster—12.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of sundry citizens of Beaufort, North Carolina, praying for the erection of a marine hospital, that subject being already reported on.

Mr. DAVIS from the same committee, reported without amendment the bill for the relief of the owners of the brig Despatch and cargo.

Mr. D. from the same committee, reported without amendment the bill from the House to change the name of the Dighton collection district, in Massachusetts, to that of Fall River; and on motion of Mr. D. and by unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to issue a patent to James Smith; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CALHOUN in pursuance of notice given, asked and obtained leave and introduced a bill to order to the new States the public lands which lie in them, on certain conditions; which was read.

On motion of Mr. CALHOUN, the bill was read the second time; when

Mr. ROBINSON moved to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. WEBSTER moved a re-consideration of the vote, ordering the bill to a second reading, with a view to have that question taken by yeas and nays to-morrow.

The CHAIR said that the motion was not in order, as the question pending was the reference of the bill.

After some remarks from Messrs. WALKER, CALHOUN, WEBSTER, CLAY, BENTON, and HUBBARD,

Mr. ROBINSON withdrew his motion; and

Mr. WEBSTER, by general consent, moved to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a second reading; and the question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hubbard, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Niles, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Calhoun, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Tipton, Walker, and White—22.

The bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, came up on a third reading; and, after a debate, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, GRUNDY, WALKER, CLAY, TIPTON, EWING of Ohio, and DAVIS took part, was read a third time and passed—yeas 27, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, and White—23.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the title of the bill so as to read, a bill to arrest the monopoly of the public lands; but, at the suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY, withdrew the motion; and Mr. GRUNDY moved to add to the title the words "and for other purposes," which was agreed to; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1837.

The CHAIR announced the unfinished business, being the question of privilege, involved in the consideration of the following resolutions in relation to Mr. Adams:

The original resolution moved by Mr. THOMPSON, was modified by him, at the suggestion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, as follows:

Resolved, 1. That the Hon. John Quincy Adams, a member of this House, by stating, in his place, that he had in his possession a paper purporting to be a petition from slaves, and inquiring if it came within the meaning of a resolution heretofore adopted, (as preliminary to its presentation) has given color to a report, (as slaves have the right of petition, and of his readiness to be their organ, and that for the same he deserves the censure of this House.

2. Resolved, That the aforesaid John Q. Adams receive a censure from the Speaker in the presence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BYNUM had offered the following as a substitute: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert, "That an attempt to present any petition or memorial from any slave or slaves, or free negro, from any part of the Union, is a contempt of the House, and calculated to embroil it in a strife and confusion incompatible with the dignity of the body; and that any member guilty of the same, justly subjects himself to the censure of the House."

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the fact whether any such attempt has been made by any member of this House, and report the same to the House as soon as practicable.

The question immediately pending was the following amendment to the amendment, moved by Mr. PATTON:

Resolved, That the right of petition does not belong to slaves of this Union; that no petition from them can be presented to this House without derogating from the rights of the slaveholding States, and endangering the integrity of the Union.

Resolved, That every member who shall hereafter present any such petition to this House, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of this House, the rights of the South, and an enemy to the Union.

Resolved, That the Hon. John Q. Adams, having solemnly disclaimed a design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House in the inquiry he made of the Speaker as to the right of petition purporting to be from slaves, and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition, if the House was of opinion that it ought not to be presented—therefore all further proceedings as to his conduct now cease.

Mr. FRENCH, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at length in support of the resolution under consideration. He first went into an examination of the Constitution to show what the ultimate efforts of the abolitionists, if they were countenanced in their efforts, must lead to; and to show that the right of petition alone belonged to those who were entitled to the right of representation. The people of the U. States, he argued, who had elected delegates to a convention to form a Constitution, and their posterity, were the only persons who were legitimately entitled to the right of petition; and Indians and negroes were not entitled to this privilege. The right of petition went hand in hand with the right of representation. He admitted that our Government had received the petitions of foreigners and of Indian tribes, and he regretted to say there was now on the Speaker's table a petition from free negroes; but he was glad there was a pending motion to have this latter petition removed from the table; but these petitions were only admitted by the acquiescence of the Government; and those petitioners could not claim the right of forcing their petitions upon the Government.

The Constitution recognised the institution of slavery, and he hoped those gentlemen who lived in those sections of country where the abolitionists were most numerous, would impress upon their minds the necessity of desisting from their efforts. Mr. F. said, suppose that three-fifths of the slave population of Louisiana be equal to one-half of the white population, would the abolitionists attempt to deprive that State of half of her representation, by the abolition of slavery within her limits. The southern people had no desire to deprive any of the northern States of one-half of their representation, and he hoped the same feeling prevailed in the non-slaveholding States towards the southern States.

With regard to the resolution of the 18th of January, he did not consider that it either abridged or enlarged the right of petition. By adopting that resolution the majority of the House were endeavoring to silence agitation on this question of abolition, to put an end to agitation by receiving and laying these petitions on the table.

Towards the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) Mr. F. had always extended the greatest indulgence, both from respect to his high character, and the high station he had filled, and his high attainments; but, at the same time, he felt it to be his duty to mete out to him the same justice for the contempt he had shown to the House which he would to the most humble member on that floor. If, however, a majority of the House should differ with him, and should consider that the explanations which the gentleman had made were sufficient, he so; he had discharged his duty.

Mr. MILLIGAN said he did not rise for the purpose of entering into this discussion; his object was rather to arrest it. With this design he had made several efforts to get the floor when the subject was last under discussion, but had failed. However, much he might have regretted the course pursued by the gentleman, it must be evident that the present discussion could lead to no practical good. Mr. M. said he came from a section of country from which he thought he could look on this question impartially. The people of the State from which he came, whatever their opinions might be as to the abstract question of slavery, considered the question settled by the Constitution, and that the matter rested alone with those States in which slavery existed, to regulate it as they might deem proper. They admitted that it was a subject for local legislation; and, whether it was a blessing or a curse, they were disposed to allow those States to manage it in their own way. As the friend, therefore, of both sections of the Union, he invoked of gentlemen to withdraw this exciting question, and cease a discussion of a nature so agitating. He appealed to his friends from the North, that while they stood there as the strenuous advocates of the right of petition, not to exercise it in a manner to interfere with the rights of others; and he appealed to those gentlemen from the South, who were so much excited on this occasion, to withdraw discussion of this kind. Mr. M. knew there was no intention, on the part of their northern brethren, to interfere in this matter of slavery, and that those who kept up the agitation in the North were but a very small number. Mr. M. concluded, by moving to lay the resolution, and all pending amendments, on the table.

Mr. GHOLSON called for the yeas and nays, on this motion.

Mr. ADAMS rose and said, that if he should say any thing now which was not strictly in accordance with the rules of the House, he hoped he would be excused, considering the position he occupied. He did not desire these resolutions to be laid on the table without being heard.

Mr. GHOLSON called Mr. ADAMS to order.

Mr. MILLIGAN said, if the gentleman from Massachusetts felt at all aggrieved by the motion to lay the resolutions on the table, he would withdraw it.

Mr. ADAMS did feel aggrieved by the motion to lay on the table,

Mr. MILLIGAN then withdrew the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. ADAMS did not wish to interrupt the deliberations of the House, but if the resolution of censure was to be passed, he wished to be heard in his own defence. If the resolution did not pass, he would then ask of the House to determine on the only question which would be then before it.

Mr. EVANS insisted that the charge of offence, on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, was too vague to justify a vote of censure upon him. There was nothing specific. The resolution did not set forth any thing like contempt towards the House, or even an infringement of its rules, but that he had "given color to the idea" that slaves had the right to petition. Mr. E. held that the House had the right to punish a member for a determined violation of its rules; because, otherwise, the whole business of the country might be obstructed by a disorderly member; but no man could be punished for the expression of his honest opinions. The limitation to this, such as personalities, reflections upon the past conduct of the House, &c. were expressly laid down in the lex parlamentaria. With reference to the right of slaves to petition, he said there were cases embracing it. It had been said, also, the slave had no constitutional rights but through his master. This was not so; and he put the cases of murder, or unprovoked assault, and that of alleged kidnapping, where his legal rights were recognised and frequently put in force.

Mr. PICKENS explained, that if the gentleman from Maine was alluding to his argument, he (Mr. P.) had not said the slave had no legal rights, but that he had no constitutional or political rights. That was a question he should like to hear the gentleman argue.

Mr. EVANS was referring to constitutional or legal rights, which he insisted had been secured to the slave. He then adverted to the general character of the petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, in none of which was there found any harsh language in relation to the peculiar institutions of the South or southern men, nor any expressed or implied wish to interfere with those institutions. There might be a few solitary exceptions, but it should be borne in mind that there was much warmth on both sides. The right of the abolitionists to petition, however, should have been respected, and their memorials continued to be received as they formerly had been. While this was done, their numbers were few, and their efforts feeble; but they had increased in numbers, and become more powerful, from the manner in which they had been treated by Congress. They contended that slavery was a great moral, social, and political evil, and was, besides, indefensible by argument; and the refusal of the House to listen to them, and argue with them, justified them, in their own opinion, in these allegations; but there was nothing insulting in this. Even that language was borrowed from Virginia; and he was about to cite some passages from the debates in that State on the adoption of the Constitution, containing this declaration, when

Mr. PATTON arose, and hoped the Chair would restrict the limits of the debate within the proper range of order. If the gentleman was suffered to go on in this way, it must be obvious that a debate was springing up which would be interminable.

The CHAIR reminded the House that he had several times interposed to confine the debate within the proper limits, and had repeatedly reminded gentlemen that they were taking too wide a range, but in the performance of that duty he had not been sustained by the House. As he had been called upon, however, he should enforce the rule, and take the sense of the House whether the gentleman from Maine should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays; giving, as a reason for so doing, that upon this vote would depend whether the business of the session should be entirely set aside or not.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, and the CHAIR being about to propound the question,

Mr. ELMORE wished to say one word. He was perfectly willing, if it should be the wish of the House to hear the question fully discussed, but otherwise—

Several members here rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE of Mississippi caught the eye of the Chair, and inquired if this motion for leave was debatable.

The CHAIR believed it was not.

Mr. WISE would submit whether this was the proper mode of deciding whether a discussion was relevant or irrelevant? Was there any precedent for it? On the contrary, had not the practice heretofore been that the Chair decided whether the course of remarks of gentlemen was irrelevant, and if the gentleman objected to the decision of the Chair, that he then took an appeal? Mr. W. wished to know if the office of the Chair was not to interpose in that manner, and why had it been departed from in the present case? Was it not the duty of the Chair to decide him out of order, and he would further inquire whether the question could be propounded to, and decided by, the House before an appeal was taken? Finally, he would inquire why this distinction?

The CHAIR will state the question: There is no difficulty.

Mr. WISE. I am not through yet, sir.

The CHAIR. There is no appeal, but the Chair will require the gentleman from Virginia to reduce his point to writing.

Mr. PATTON said, as the point of order might consume more time perhaps than the remarks of the gentleman, he would withdraw it.

Mr. ELMORE did not speak in anger, but with a view to make an appeal to the gentleman from Maine. He would suggest to that gentleman that they had already irritating topics enough before the House, and if he should be disposed to go on, an angry debate must necessarily grow out of it, on both sides of the House, that would, perhaps, be interminable; and, let him ask, what good could result from it?

Mr. EVANS would accept the application of the member from South Carolina in a corresponding spirit. He could assure that gentleman that he had endeavored not to say any thing of an irritating or angry nature. He wished, however, the member had thought of that a little earlier. He wished gentlemen on that side of the House had thought of this when denouncing the whole northern country, and the whole of New England, in very clear language, and calling upon members from that region to abstain from doing their duty in presenting their petitions, and when they charged, and almost directly, northern gentlemen with aiding, abetting, and assisting in getting up petitions, when they knew that all these charges did not justly attach to them.

Mr. ELMORE said, if the gentleman from Maine had heard his former remarks a few days ago, he would find that his present remark did not, at least, apply to him. He had then deprecated discussion, but he did not fear it, nor was he unwilling to go, or would shrink from going, into it, if it were brought up.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina wished to disabuse himself of a false impression of the tenor of his remarks, as he was the member who opened the debate. Now, in the preliminary remarks he had made, he should regard himself as unpardonable if he had not confined himself, as strictly as he could, to the question before the House, and alluded to no topics either of an irritating or angry character. The gentleman from Massachusetts had asked if the people of the North were to be denied the privilege of sympathizing in human suffering, of sympathizing for the oppressed, and those held in bondage as property. It was in reply to these remarks that Mr. T. had made his own. He had, however, used no epithets, but had adverted, as he conceived he had a perfect right to do, to the history of New England, and certain authentic facts connected with it. This he had done in repelling the attack made upon the South.

Mr. BYNUM concurred with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Patton,) which seemed to be agreed on all hands, that the gentleman from Maine had certainly departed, in this instance, from the subject properly under discussion, and he should renew the point of order.

Mr. EVANS explained. What he had said was, that very many of the gentlemen who charged those of the North, and the petitioners for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, with using language not justified in reference to southern institutions; language not courteous to themselves, and showing a misconception of the institutions of slavery, had themselves used the same language. He wanted to rescue these petitioners, himself, and others, from the charge of first using such language, but that it had been used in all time.

Mr. BYNUM. If the object of the gentleman be to argue the question of slavery, he hoped no southern man would countenance it, by arguing it also. It was a subject that House could not settle, and had no right to intermeddle with in any manner whatsoever.

Mr. EVANS. I am not going to discuss the question of slavery. I was going—

Mr. BYNUM was also proceeding, when

Mr. GHOLSON rose to a subject of order. Both gentlemen could not be suffered to address the House at the same time.

The CHAIR said, the gentleman from Maine was in possession of the floor, and if any gentleman called him to order, he must reduce it to writing.

Mr. EVANS was not going to discuss the question of the institution of slavery. They of the North had been charged with the use of words in reference to the institutions of the South, for which they had been held responsible. Now, he wanted to show that it was language they had borrowed from themselves. He wanted also to show they were not guilty of the charge of undermining the prosperity of the South. He said that many gentlemen on that floor complained that they held at the North that slavery was an evil. Well, they did, and so did many of the South themselves, and that was what he was about to prove. But the North did not hold the present holders of that species of property, as many supposed, responsible for it. They regarded it, on the contrary, as an institution fixed, and found in existence, and tolerated among them, long before the present time. He was about to show that that language, in reference to the institution of slavery, was language held by slave holders themselves, and that those of the North had modelled their ideas from Southern authority. Mr. E. was again proceeding to read from the debates in the Virginia convention, when

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri objected, and the CHAIR sustained the point that no gentleman could, under the rules, read any paper to the House without its leave.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the gentleman from Missouri would withdraw his objection.

Mr. EVANS. I cannot yield the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I call the gentleman to order, though, if the House were disposed to permit a discussion on the subject of slavery, he was himself fully prepared to meet it.

Mr. EVANS. I will waive that part of my argument.

The CHAIR. Does the gentleman from Missouri waive his point or order?

Mr. GHOLSON. The gentleman from Maine does not waive his argument on the subject of slavery, but only the reading from the book.

Mr. ANTHONY moved that the question be taken, and asked for the yeas and nays; but, after a few words from the CHAIR, withdrew his motion.

Mr. BOULDIN would be anxious for the gentleman to proceed.

The CHAIR said it was for the House to determine.

Mr. BOULDIN rose again, and was proceeding, when

Mr. EVERETT called the gentleman to order; and asked if there was any question before the House?

The CHAIR stated the question raised by Mr. HARRISON, and decided in favor of the point of order raised by that gentleman. He suggested to the House that they take the question on the motion to grant leave for the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. ELMORE took an appeal from the decision of the Chair, for the purpose, he said, of getting an opportunity of setting himself right on the subject. He was for allowing the gentleman from Maine to go on, according to his own judgment and his own discretion; and he was also for holding that gentleman responsible. Mr. E. did not want to stifle debate, but to leave it perfectly open. We of the South (continued Mr. E.) did not fear discussion on this subject, here or elsewhere, in any manner in which it could be brought forward; but I would submit to that gentleman, and to those who act with him, that if there was any thing that could lead to the most lamentable consequences, it is the very course they are now pursuing. The gentleman from Maine had asked why was not this call made upon him as an earlier period of this debate?

Mr. E. hoped the gentleman would remember that he had, at the commencement of it, called upon all his friends, upon all the members from the South, to vote, and not to speak, upon the subject; for it was one calculated, in its consequences, to bring the different portions of the country into direct conflict. It was that he might save the country, if possible, from a posture of affairs that could not but be most disastrous. At the same time, however, he was willing that they should be understood; but upon those of the North be the responsibility.

It was said that they of the South had provoked this attack upon themselves; that they had been the first in denouncing the gentleman of the North, and had been pursuing a course of debate that called for a reply. He denied this. Had the gentleman forgotten what was then on the table? Had they—

Mr. VANDERPOEL called the gentleman to order. He understood the question the gentleman arose to discuss was the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and he had not, as yet, even adverted to it.

Mr. ELMORE said, if the gentleman had spared his breath on a moment, he should have concluded. He had risen simply to deprecate the allegation brought by the member from Maine. He then withdrew his appeal, and moved that the gentleman have leave to go on.

Mr. ANTHONY renewed the appeal. He stated that he did so because it was evident that, from the commencement of the debate till that time, a great deal had been already said of a most irritating character on both sides, and that irritation would only increase as it progressed, if it was suffered to proceed. He was the only member from his own State who had taken any part in the subject, and he had moved the previous question, but there were so many cries of "No!" "No!" that he was induced to withdraw his motion. He did it to arrest the excitement he saw growing out of the subject, and he made the present appeal for the same purpose.

The CHAIR again suggested that the best mode would be to take the question on the motion for the gentleman from Maine to proceed.

Mr. ANTHONY did not wish to give the gentlemen on either side leave to continue this discussion of slavery any further, and he therefore hoped every moderate man in the House would join him in arresting its further progress. Mr. A. then withdrew his appeal, and expressed a hope that the question would, according to the judicious suggestion of the Chair, be at once taken on granting leave for the gentleman from Maine to proceed.

Mr. GLASCOCK rose to address the House; but

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that this was not a debatable question.

Mr. GLASCOCK wished simply to remark that appeals had been made in the most respectful manner, from various quarters of the House, that the gentleman from Maine should dispense with pursuing this subject any further; and Mr. G. was inclined to believe, from the course recently taken by that gentleman, that he was disposed to acquiesce. On the call to order, the gentleman had taken his seat, and did not take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. If then the motion on granting leave were withdrawn, all difficulty would be removed, and the doing so, would save a great deal of unpleasant feeling, and supersede the necessity of taking either question.

The CHAIR then pronounced the question, "That the gentleman from Maine have leave to proceed."

Mr. GLASCOCK moved to amend the motion by adding the words, "if he feels disposed to do so."

The CHAIR pronounced the question at length, as follows: The gentleman from Maine is called to order because he is speaking of the opinions of others on the subject of slavery, when that question is not before the House. The Chair decides that it is not in order to discuss the question of slavery, or to cite the opinions of others upon that subject on the question before the House. The gentleman from Maine resumed his seat, and acquiesced in the decision of the Chair, taking no appeal. The role required, therefore, that before the gentleman could proceed, the sense of the House must be taken; if the decision had been in favor of the member called to order, he would proceed as a matter of course.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri begged to inquire whether, if the gentleman should be permitted to proceed by a vote of the House, he must not still confine himself within the rules of the House?

Mr. BOULDIN. He would, he expected, go on pretty much as he had done.

The CHAIR said the gentleman would still be limited to the rules of debate.

Mr. EVANS did not want to discuss this matter. Gentlemen supposed he wanted to discuss the institution of slavery, but it was not so. He did not wish to introduce any new topics here, but to confine himself to what had been opened by those who had preceded him. This, he believed, was what he had done. He had been strictly on the defensive—on the defensive against a charge made against the venerable and distinguished member from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams), for presenting petitions to that House containing language offensive to the South. He wished to prove this was not so, but that the language came originally from the South, in substance and in terms.

Mr. E. should not proceed at all on the vote of the House, be it which way it might.

Mr. ELMORE preferred allowing the gentleman to proceed as he pleased, as he had introduced these topics.

The CHAIR said if leave should be granted, the gentleman must still proceed in order.

Mr. ALFORD remarked that if the gentleman went on a little, he would soon explain his purpose.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman did not himself ask leave, but refused, beforehand, to proceed on the vote of the house. What would be the use of granting leave?

Mr. ELMORE replied, the gentleman asks what would be the object of granting leave? It was that the House might not be charged with having choked the member down, but that he might be permitted to go on upon his own responsibility.

Mr. PATTON then read the following modification of his amendment:

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union.

Resolved, That the Hon. John Q. Adams, having solemnly disclaimed all design of doing any thing disrespectful to the House, in the inquiry he made of the Speaker, as to the petition purporting to be from slaves; and having avowed his intention not to offer to present the petition to the House, was of opinion that it ought not to be presented; therefore, all further proceedings in regard to his conduct do now cease.

Mr. ELMORE withdrew his motion.

Mr. PATTON moved the above, which

Mr. THOMPSON accepted, and Mr. BYNUM withdrew his amendment.

Mr. ELMORE then renewed his motion in relation to granting leave to Mr. EVANS, and after a few words from Messrs. BRIGGS, PHILLIPS and MERCER, it was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS then rose and said, that the course of remarks he was pursuing having been decided to be out of order, if he should again proceed he would still be pronounced to be out of order, which from the first had been far from his intention. He intended, certainly, and thought he was standing on the defensive, and there he meant to stand. Had he been permitted to proceed, he should have concluded in a few minutes. He had, however, several other things to say, but as they would be pronounced out of order, and he be again required to take his seat, he had expressed a disposition not to proceed if the House voted him leave, because that vote for leave would carry upon its face the implication that he was seeking to introduce topics not pertinent to the question. He therefore would not conclude the observations he designed making on this resolution, except by saying that he should vote against it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to Mr. V. to withdraw this motion, to allow him to submit some remarks to the House.

Mr. VANDERPOEL could not withdraw the motion, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts would pledge himself to renew the motion when he had concluded his remarks.

Mr. ADAMS said it was not in his power to comply with this request, because he desired to have the opportunity of a full hearing in his own defence, and he had hoped he would be granted the privilege.

Mr. KENNON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered, and were—yeas 50, nays 144, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton, Allan, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bell, Black, Bockee, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Chetwood, Cramer, Crary, Doubleday, Dunlap, Farlin, Forester, Fry, Fuller, Rice Garland, Hannegan, Henderson, Hubley, Huntington, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kennon, Kingsmith, Lansing, Laporte, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Logan, Job Mann, Moses Mason, McCarty, McKay, McKim, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Parks, Patterson, Phelps, Joseph Reynolds, Seymour, Sickles, Turner, Turill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, White, Lewis Williams, and Wise—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Boyce, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chapman, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dromgoole, Elmer, Elmore, Evans, Everett, French, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Hazeltine, Hoar, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Huntsman, Ingham, William Jackson, James, Jarvis, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, John W. Jones, Lane, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Martin, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, William McComas, Tho. M. T. McKennan, John McKean, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Owens, Page, Parker, Patton, Dutee J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Schenck, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vandermuel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, White, Elisha Whitesley, Thomas T. Whitesley, Lewis Williams, Wise, Yell, and Young—144.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. GRANGER said he rose as a representative of the State of New York, to appeal to his colleague to withdraw his motion, to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to make some remarks in his own defence. Is a member of this House not to be permitted—

The CHAIR said it was not in order to entertain debate after the previous question was moved.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired if it was not in order to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he had considered of what he had done, and he could not withdraw the motion he had made.

Mr. REED wished to know how the present resolution got before the House.

The CHAIR explained that it was a modification of the former resolutions.

Mr. REED made a point that the resolution before the House was not in order, because other resolutions and amendments were pending.

The CHAIR decided that the resolution was in order, and explained that the amendments had been withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina wished to know if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Reed) had appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REED appealed from the decision of the Chair, but, after a few explanations between him and the Chair, he withdrew the appeal.

Mr. BRIGGS then raised a point of order, that, because the first resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina being in relation to the subject of slavery, it ought to lie on the table, under the order of the House of the 18th of January last.

The CHAIR decided that the resolution of the 18th of January did not operate on this resolution, and that it was in order. From this decision Mr. BRIGGS took an appeal to the House, and was proceeding to debate the appeal, when

The CHAIR informed him, that this appeal could not be debated, inasmuch as the previous question had been moved.

Mr. BRIGGS then called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, but withdrew the appeal before the vote was taken.

Mr. ADAMS then made a point of order, that inasmuch as the first resolution was not upon the subject then pending before the House, namely, the question of privilege, it could not be entertained.

The SPEAKER decided that the resolution was in order, and stated the grounds of his decision.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from this decision, and was proceeding to make some remarks, when

Mr. GHOLSON called him to order.

Mr. ADAMS then asked the consent of the House to submit some remarks.

The CHAIR said this could only be done by the general consent of the House.

Mr. GHOLSON objected.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), to address the House.

The CHAIR decided this motion to be out of order, inasmuch as the previous question had been moved.

Mr. WISE rose to inquire whether it was in order to modify a privileged question, so as to make it any thing else than a privileged question.

The CHAIR said the modification of the resolution at present before the House was in order.

Mr. WISE remarked, that he had nothing more to say on this subject.

Mr. HOWELL wished to know whether these resolutions did not effect a change of the rules of the House.

The CHAIR did not consider that they did.

The question was then taken on the second to the previous question, when it appeared that the previous question was not seconded—yeas 79, nays 100.

Mr. WISE then said, he wished merely to remark, that he hoped the House, after hearing as they ought to hear, the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), would be disposed to take the question without further debate; because he had an important matter to lay before the House from one of the select committee.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded to address the House at great length in defence of his conduct.

Mr. HANNEGAN then obtained the floor, and moved the previous question, but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, who made some remarks in reply to Mr. ADAMS, and then renewed the motion for the previous question; which was seconded by the House—yeas 93, nays 42.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. GHOLSON called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment.

Mr. BOULDIN called for the yeas and nays, which were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 137, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Bockee, Bond, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Corwin, Cushman, Doubleday, Dunlap, Forester, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Gillet, Harper, Henderson, Howell, Hubley, Huntington, Cave Johnson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kingsmith, Lane, Laporte, Leonard, Logan, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, McCarty, McKay, McKean, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Parks, Patterson, Phelps, Joseph Reynolds, Seymour, Sickles, Turner, Turill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, White, Lewis Williams, and Wise—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Clifton Allen, Heman Allen, Bailey, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Bynum, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chapman, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dromgoole, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, James Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hannegan, Hard, Hardin, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Hazeltine, Herod, Hoar, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, William Jackson, James, Jarvis, Jenifer, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Martin, Moses Mason, Maury, McComas, McKennan, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Owens, Page, Parker, Patton, Dutee J. Pearce, Pearson, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Schenck, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepherd, Shields, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Sprague, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, John Thomson, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Ward, Wardwell, Elisha Whitesley, Thomas T. Whitesley, Sherrod Williams, and Yell—137.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, which were not ordered, and the main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote separately on each resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the first resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. PARKER called for a division of the first resolution, making the first branch of the resolution end with the word "House."

The SPEAKER decided this to be out of order, as the latter clause of the resolution would not be a substantive proposition which could stand by itself.

The question was then taken the first resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 105, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Beale, Bell, Bouldin, Boyd, Bynum, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, J. Chambers, Chapman, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmore, Forester, French, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Hannegan, Hardin, Albert G. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, W. B. Calhoun, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Evans, Everett, Fowler, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Gillet, Granger, Grennell, Haley, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Herod, Hoar, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, William Jackson, James, Jarvis, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Kingsmith, Lane, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Logan, Love, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Milligan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Patterson, D. J. Pearce, Pearson, Phelps, Phillips, Potts, Reed, J. Reynolds, Russell, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Sloan, Spangler, Sprague, Storer, Sutherland, John Thomson, Underwood, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, Elisha Whitesley, and Thomas T. Whitesley—105.

So the first resolution was rejected.

Mr. PICKENS rose and said, as the first resolution had been rejected, he hoped the mover would withdraw the second.

The CHAIR replied that the resolution could not now be withdrawn.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to lay the second resolution on the table; which was pronounced to be out of order.

The question was then taken on the second resolution by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 137, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Black, John Calhoun, Carter, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John P. H. Claiborne, Craig, Deberry, Dunlap, Gholson, Huntsman, Jenifer, Lawler, Abijah Mann, Maury, Robertson, Shields, Standefer, Wagener and Sherrod Williams—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Barton, Beaumont, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, William B. Hall, Hamer, Hard, Hardin, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Herod, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, William Jackson, James, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Kingensmith, Lane, Laporte, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Lincoln, Logan, Love, Lucas, Job Mann, Moses Munson, Sampson Mason, McCarty, McKay, McKennan, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Page, Parker, Patterson, Dutee J. Shepperd, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Sprague, Storer, Sutherland, Thomas, John Thomson, Turner, Underwood, Vanderpool, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, White, Elisha Whitteley, Thomas T. Whitteley, Lewis, Williams, and Wise—137.

So the second resolution was rejected.

Mr. LANE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 72, nays 84.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. McCARTY moved a reconsideration of the vote by which a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting the correspondence between the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the land office at Fort Wayne, Indiana, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which motion lies over.

Mr. WISE then rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for not adjourning. I will detain it but for a few moments, and I should not press the matter I have to bring to its notice at this time, but for the fact that to-morrow, and, indeed, during the whole time of the sessions of the House, my duty will call my attention to the select committee of which I am a member, and from the character of the report itself. It is a report affecting a question of privilege.

I am directed, continued Mr. W. by the committee appointed on the 17th of January last, to report the following resolution, which, I will premise, was adopted by the unanimous vote of the committee. Mr. W. then read as follows:

"Reuben M. Whitney, who has been summoned as a witness before this committee, having, by letter, informed the committee of his peremptory refusal to attend, it becomes the duty of the committee to make the House acquainted with the fact; therefore,

Resolved, That the chairman be directed to report the letter of Reuben M. Whitney to the House, that such order may be taken thereon as the dignity and character of the House require."

Mr. W. reiterated the fact that this resolution had been unanimously adopted, and he sent to the Clerk's table the letter of the witness, together with another letter showing the manner in which the former had been communicated to the select committee.

[This letter was from the Hon. ABIAH MANN of New York, but, on application, it could not be obtained.]

[The witness's letter will be found in the Globe of Thursday.]

Mr. W. continued. I will remark, sir, that by this communication from the member of the committee into whose hands the letter of the witness fell before it fell into mine, this letter of this contumacious witness reached the committee, but I could not, from self-respect, present it. Sir, I considered it disrespectful to the committee, as much as to myself personally. I ask that it be read.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island said, under the supposition that this subject would come up as the first business in order to-morrow morning, and as it was one that would be likely to produce debate, he moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANN of New York asked the gentleman from Rhode Island to withdraw the motion for a moment to enable him to move that the question be postponed till to-morrow, and that the letter of the witness, and the accompanying documents, be printed.

Mr. PEARCE accordingly withdrew the motion.

Mr. WISE. I hope this House will not order that letter to be printed until they see whether it be fit to be printed or not.

Mr. PEARCE then renewed his motion, and

The House adjourned at 7 o'clock, P. M.

To the Publishers of the Globe:

House REP's, Feb. 9, 1837.

GENTLEMEN: In your paper of this morning, containing a report of the debate on Tuesday last, I find I was misunderstood by the reporter when he says, "Mr. Jenifer, who was entitled to the floor, stated that he was gratified to have it in his power to state that 'mutual explanations had taken place between his colleague (Mr. Pearce,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Cambreleng,) which were perfectly satisfactory to all parties.'" The remarks were, "that a voluntary explanation had been made since the adjournment of the House, by the gentleman from New York to my colleague, which was satisfactory." My colleague had no explanation to make. Your obdt servant,

D. JENIFER.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1837.

The CHAIR presented a memorial from the Mayor and Common Council of the city of Mobile, praying for an appropriation for removing the obstructions in Mobile bay: referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also a memorial from an individual, (name not heard,) stating that he is confined in prison for a debt alleged to be due to the United States, and praying to be allowed to contest the claim, which he denies is justly due: referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the Hon. MARTIN VAN BUREN, and inform him that he has been elected President of the United States, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them, and had received for answer that he desired to express the grateful sense that he entertained of the distinguished honor which his fellow-citizens had conferred on him; and requested them to assure their respective Houses, that they might rely on his unceasing endeavors to execute the responsible trust which devolved on him, in a manner most conducive to the public interest.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Elizabeth Scott, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that it be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

The bill from the House for the relief of Thomas Hunt, was read the second time, and ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BLACK the bill to designate and limit the funds which shall be receivable for the public revenue, was taken up on its third reading; and, after some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, WALKER, CLAY, NILES, and CALHOUN, it was passed—yeas 41, nays 5, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1837.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky, on leave, presented some papers in relation to a private claim.

Mr. BOON, in the absence of one of his colleagues from indisposition, (Mr. Davis,) moved a reference of certain papers in relation to another claim; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARD rose to make a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals, but

The CHAIR said the privileged question, being the report made by Mr. Wise last evening from the select committee of which he is chairman, [as given above,] was the first business in order.

Mr. WISE then rose and asked that the letter communicated by himself to the House last evening be read, [viz: R. M. Whitney's letter, the same which is in Wednesday's Globe,] in order that it might judge of its character, and take such steps as its own character and dignity deemed necessary. The resolution, he repeated, was unanimous—unanimous, and submitted a question to that House—the serious and important question on adopting some course to defend its own dignity and its own character. He asked the reading of the letter, in order that any gentleman who wished, might submit such a proposition as he might deem necessary.

Mr. WHITNEY's letter was then read from the Clerk's table.

The CHAIR remarked, that the memorial alluded to had been laid upon his table on Monday last, after the meeting of the House, but in consequence of the House being occupied in another question, he had not the opportunity of presenting it to the House.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired if this memorial in the possession of the Chair was the same as that attached to the letter of Mr. Whitney?

The CHAIR replied, that he could not say certainly, as he had given it but a hasty reading, but he could say the general tenor of it was the same.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired whether the Chair would then present it to the House?

The CHAIR replied, that with the general consent of the House the petition might now be presented.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, said, as this was a distinct matter altogether from the one before the House, he must object to the presentation of the petition at this time. He would have no objection to it being presented at a proper time.

Mr. WISE said the letter asserted that the memorial attached thereto was a copy of the one on the Speaker's table. That question, however, is considered to have no bearing on the one before the House.

Mr. PARKER desired to know if the presentation of this memorial might not supersede the necessity of making any other motion.

The CHAIR replied, the petition could not now be presented, unless by the consent of the House, objection having been made.

Mr. LINCOLN then presented the following resolutions:

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney, in refusing to appear as a witness before a select committee of the House, acting by the authority of the House, under a resolution of the 17th January last, after being duly summoned thereto, has been guilty of a contempt of the committee and of the House.

Resolved, That the letter addressed by the said R. M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the notice of this House, declaring his determination peremptorily to decline to appear before any committee constituted in such manner, and of such persons as the pleasure and judgment of the House shall designate, until the House, as a condition precedent, shall have redressed his supposed wrongs, both in the manner and style of communication, is contumelious, arrogant, and offensive, alike disrespectful to the House, and utterly subversive of its rightful authority.

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody the person of the said R. M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the House for the contempt aforesaid.

Mr. LINCOLN then went into an argument of considerable length in support of his resolutions, and explained that the resolutions were introduced on his own responsibility, he having no order from the committee to introduce them.

Mr. BRIGGS then suggested that the two first resolutions were unnecessary. If they were stricken out, he considered the last would then conform to former precedents.

Mr. LINCOLN said he had not introduced the resolutions without some reflection. The two first resolutions he considered as the mere inducement to the third.

Mr. BRIGGS then referred to former precedent to show the correctness of his suggestions, and read from the journals the proceedings in the case of Anderson and Houston. He considered that the two first resolutions, if adopted, would be passing upon the guilt of the witness before he had had a hearing; and that they were introduced at too early a stage of the proceeding.

Mr. LINCOLN argued that it did not follow, if they adopted his resolution, that it pronounced the witness guilty.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved to amend the resolutions by striking out all after the word "Resolved" in the first, and to make the second read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House issue his warrant, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody the person of Reuben M. Whitney; and that he be brought to the bar of the House, to answer for an alleged contempt of this House.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired if this resolution was adopted, what the alleged contempt would be?

The CHAIR said the report of the committee would be the only thing to show it.

Mr. LINCOLN said the report did not allege any contempt at all. If, however, his colleague could prepare a modification of the resolution, which would show what the witness was to be brought to the bar of the House for, he would willingly accept. He contended, however, that before any citizen could be arrested and brought to the bar of the House, some allegation must be made against him; and he did not consider that the two first resolutions went to criminate the witness at all before hearing.

Mr. PARKS agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts that there should be some allegation, brought against this individual, and that he should be heard by himself or by counsel, before the House of Representatives of the United States should pronounce any sentence. He could never consent to the passage of any resolution condemning a citizen of the United States without his having the opportunity of a hearing. As to the alleged contempt, the committee had not said a word; they had studiously avoided it, but had left it to the House to take such measures as it saw fit in relation thereto. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) might allege what he pleased on his own authority, but Mr. W. must stand up there against any condemnation of a citizen without a hearing.

Mr. MERCER suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts to modify his resolution, so as to embrace the allegations in a preamble.

Mr. BRIGGS then modified his amendment, by prefixing thereto the following preamble: "Whereas, a committee of this House have reported that Reuben M. Whitney, of the city of Washington, has peremptorily refused to appear before said committee, to give evidence, in obedience, to a summons issued by said committee, therefore, Resolved, &c."

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island understood that some member of the House was charged with a memorial from this individual which, he presumed, would be presented to the House at a proper time, and then they would know something about the sufficiency or insufficiency of his reasons for not appearing before the committee. He considered that they should know something of his reasons before they passed such resolutions as those introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln).

Mr. LINCOLN then accepted of the modification of his colleague (Mr. Briggs) to his resolutions.

Mr. HARDIN made a few remarks in reply to the argument of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce.)

Mr. LANE suggested that the resolution be modified, so that the House might express an opinion that Whitney should appear before the committee and give evidence. If this was done, he doubted not but the witness would appear before the committee, and answer all proper interrogatories; and by this means much time would be saved, and they had but a very short time now left for the transaction of a great mass of important business.

Mr. LINCOLN then modified his resolution to read as follows:

Resolved, That whereas the Select Committee of this House, acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of the 17th January last, has reported that R. M. Whitney has premeditatedly refused to give evidence to a summons duly issued by said committee, and has addressed to the committee the letter reported by said committee to the House, therefore Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant, directing the Sergeant-at-arms to take into his custody Reuben M. Whitney, that he may be brought to the bar of the House, to answer for an alleged contempt of this House.

Mr. PARKS then offered to strike out the words "for an alleged contempt," and insert, "to answer for his conduct in so refusing to appear before said committee."

Mr. WISE then made some remarks in reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce.)

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. ROBERTSON, MERCER, A. MANN, PARKS, BOND, and VANDERPOEL, when

Mr. BOON demanded the previous question; but the House refused to second it, only 61 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. THOMSON of Ohio moved to strike out the word "warrant," so as to make it read "summons," &c. alleging as a reason that, in the absence of depositions, &c. the House could not, without violating the letter and spirit of the Constitution, take this individual into custody. He hoped the House would not take a citizen into custody upon the mere presumption or assumption of a crime, without proof.

Mr. GRAVES agreed with the gentlemen on general grounds, but then in this case the allegation was already in possession of the House on the individual's own allegation.

Mr. THOMSON rejoined, by putting a single question to the gentleman from Kentucky, could an individual, for a confession made out of court, be arrested and put in duress therefore? He could not, consistent with the Constitution.

After a few words from Messrs. LINCOLN and CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, Mr. T's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Miss. moved to amend the second resolution, by adding the words "and that he be allowed counsel on that occasion should he desire it," which Mr. LINCOLN accepted, as a modification of his resolution.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. CLAIBORNE of Miss. and TURRILL, when, on the call of Mr. THOMSON of Ohio, the yeas and nays were ordered on the adoption of the resolution, and after a further discussion between Messrs. THOMSON of Ohio, GARLAND of La. BOON, GHOLSON WISE, HARKIN, ASHLEY, JENIFER, PEYTON, ROBERTSON, MCKEON and GLASCOCK.

Mr. BOON had but very few words to say as a reason why he should vote against the resolution then pending before the House. Sir, said Mr. B. we are now within a few short days of the close of a short and a last session of Congress, with an unusual number of bills upon the Speaker's table, of the greatest importance to the whole people of the country, which must and will fail to receive the final action of Congress at the present session, should this resolution be adopted by the House. Sir, pass this resolution and what will then follow? Why, sir, Reuben M. Whitney will be brought before the bar of this House by your Sergeant-at-arms, and a formal trial will be entered into, and under the provisions of the Constitution, you cannot deny to the prisoner at your bar the right of being heard in his defence, by himself or counsel. In the House, an interminable debate will spring up, to the entire exclusion of all legislative enactments whatever on the more important interests of the country.

Mr. B. then adverted to the case of General Samuel Houston, who was brought to the bar of that House some years since for an alleged contempt. In the case referred to, Mr. B. said that he was one of the memorable twenty-five who voted against the arrest of General Houston. A majority of the House, however, passed the resolution, and General Houston appeared at the bar of this House in the custody of your Sergeant-at-arms. He was heard in his defence by himself and counsel; and, after days and weeks had been spent in useless discussion, the House of Representatives found that there was no law defining what should be considered a contempt to the House; or the power of the House to punish any individual for an alleged contempt! It was finally resolved by the House that Samuel Houston be reprimanded by the Speaker, and that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms. Thus ended the farce in the case of Houston; and, in like manner, it will end in the case of Reuben M. Whitney. Mr. B. said that he did not know any thing of Reuben M. Whitney more than what had been said of him by others in and out of Congress; but, sir, continued he, I confess that I am not inclined to think as favorably of him, as perhaps I might have done, had he have defended himself against the attacks said to have been made upon him, as I would have done under such circumstances.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to say that if indeed, Reuben M. Whitney be the man that he has been represented to be by gentlemen standing in their places on this floor, I cannot see the propriety of his being called or summoned to give evidence in any case whatever. I shall vote against the resolution in any possible shape in which it may be presented.

Mr. GLASCOCK moved a substitute to the following effect, which, after some remarks from the honorable mover and Mr. CALHOUN of Ky. was disagreed to:

Mr. GLASCOCK said, that whatever might be his feelings in relation to Mr. Whitney, they would have no influence with him as to the vote he should give on the proposed resolutions, and he had none to gratify, unless to give a conscientious one. Mr.

G. said, that from an early period of his life he had been opposed to all and every attempt to deprive a citizen of his liberty for a single moment, unless under the strongest circumstances, and such as would fully justify him under the Constitution and laws of the land. That the power possessed by the House to arrest a citizen has been, and is still doubted by the first and most able men in the country was not questioned, and the able arguments and opinions he had heard and read, had greatly shaken his own. But he was still disposed to believe that this House has the right to authorize an inquiry into any matter connected with the Government, and to constitute and appoint committees for such purpose, clothed with the power to send for persons and papers; that it is an incidental power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to issue attachments, and punish for contempts. Without this incidental power, all such proceedings would be useless, and frequently put at defiance. Notwithstanding this view of the subject, he could not reconcile it to himself to vote for the present resolutions, by which Mr. Whitney was to be placed in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, without first giving him an opportunity of appearing before us under a rule magis, to show cause why an attachment should not issue, &c. This, said Mr. G. seemed to him to be the most prudent and proper course to adopt on the present occasion; and as the Constitution declares that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, he was not disposed to sustain any measure which would place him in duress under an alleged contempt, and without giving him an opportunity of appearing and being heard in his defence. But whenever, said Mr. G. the contempt is apparent and complete, he was prepared to go as far as any gentleman on this floor, though he would never be found voting to deprive an American citizen of his liberty, one of the dearest and most sacred rights of freemen, even for an instant, upon mere allegations. Your resolutions declare, on the face of them, said Mr. G. only an alleged contempt, and yet place him in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, without establishing the fact. Let it be made clear, let it be rendered certain, that it has been committed before we proceed to do so. He offered for the consideration of the House the following resolution:

That Reuben M. Whitney be required to appear before this House on to-morrow morning, to show cause why an attachment shall not be issued against him, for an alleged contempt in refusing to appear before the select committee, appointed under the resolution of the 17th of January.

These remarks, said Mr. G. are intended principally to apply to such cases as come under the doctrine of contempt.

Mr. GRAHAM moved a substitute in substance identical with that moved by Mr. GLASCOCK, and asked for the yeas and nays on it, but the House refused to order them, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JARVIS, after a few remarks, submitted a substitute, that the select committee appointed on the 3d of January, to inquire whether any person had been employed by the deposit banks as their agent, to transact their business at the Treasury Department, be instructed to report to this House the circumstances which occurred in the committee room on the 23d of January during the examination of Reuben M. Whitney; which, after some remarks from Mr. BELL, was disagreed to.

Mr. PATTON, after a few remarks, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. LINCOLN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the clerk was proceeding with the call—

When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, that gentleman rose in his place, and sent to the Chair his reasons, in writing, why he declined to vote upon the question.

The CLERK was about to read the paper, when

The CHAIR intimated that it would require the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MERCER said he could not agree to it, as other gentlemen might also do the same.

The CHAIR suggested that, probably, when the House heard the reasons, they might yield to it as assent.

Mr. MERCER could not consent to it under any circumstances.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the gentleman be excused.

The CHAIR said it had been decided last year that a member declining to vote was excused unless the House insisted, and he therefore directed the Clerk to proceed in the call.

Mr. ADAMS requested to be excused from voting upon this and every other question of privilege affecting Reuben M. Whitney. The personal relations between him and that individual having long been such as to make it the duty of Mr. A. to decline acting as his judge upon any question affecting his personal rights.

The call was then proceeded with, and the vote was—yeas 88, nays 97.

modified, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 85.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LANE then moved a reconsideration of the vote, by which the first resolution in relation to presenting petitions from slaves was, on yesterday, rejected.

Mr. BOON then moved to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow, which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RENCHER,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, February 11, 1837.

The CHAIR presented a communication from the War Department, transmitting a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, called for by a resolution of the Senate; which, on motion of Mr. WHITE, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a report from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 1st of February, relating to frauds in the public lands in Louisiana and elsewhere; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PRESTON presented a memorial from several enlightened and public-spirited citizens of the District of Columbia, praying Congress to establish a receptacle for collections of mineralogy and geology in this District; referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Petitions were also presented by Messrs. WHITE, PRENTISS, TOMLINSON and WALL.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the Hon. Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, and inform him that he had been elected by the Senate to the office of Vice President of the United States, reported that they had performed that duty, and had received the following letter, which they were requested to present to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I have received, with no ordinary emotions, the notice through your committee of my election to the office of Vice President of the United States by the Senate. I accept the station assigned me. This token of regard from the representatives of the States, will ever be held in grateful recollection. Permit me to tender you my sincere thanks.

Observing that your decision is in harmony with a majority of the States, and a moiety of all the electors in the primary colleges, my gratification is heightened, from the conviction that the Senate, in the exercise of their constitutional prerogative, concurred with; and confirmed the wishes both of the States and the people. Called, in virtue of this preferment, to preside in the deliberations of your enlightened body, from and after the third of March next, permit me to make use of this opportunity to say, that I cannot feel insensible to difficulties which I must anticipate, and the frequent occasion I may have for your forbearance. Though for thirty years a member of one or the other of the two Houses of Congress, yet I have never been accustomed to preside, even temporarily, over either, or in any deliberative assembly. My attention has generally been engrossed by the more immediate acts of legislation, without special regard to the minuteness of rules and orders, so necessary to the progress of business, and so important to the observance of the presiding officer.

Contemplating the character of my distinguished predecessors, and considering my deficiency in point of talent, and the want of experience for the appropriate duties of the station, it is impossible for me to overcome entirely the diffidence with which I meet this call of my fellow-citizens. But this reflection will always console me, that any errors on my part will affect me personally rather than the public; the intelligence of the Senate will guard the country from any injury that might result from the imperfections of its presiding officer, and its magnanimity will cover those imperfections with the veil of charity. In this conclusion, I find a warrant in contemplating among the members of your body so many friends with whom I have been associated in public life. It is only in the event of an equal division of the Senate that the presiding officer is called upon to give his vote. My hope is, that there may be always sufficient unanimity to prevent such a contingency. If, however, it should happen, this duty will be familiar to me, and I shall perform it without embarrassment. In exercising this power, I shall expect the same indulgence that I have ever extended to others, where differences of opinion existed.

To the Senate the most important trusts are committed. Its duties are legislative, executive, and in certain contingencies, judicial. As citizens, every branch of our Government is dear to us; but, from my more immediate relation to this, by your choice, I shall regard it with special interest. It stands pre-eminent in talent and character. In presiding over its deliberations, it shall be my effort to act with perfect respect and impartiality towards every member, and endeavor, by this course of conduct, to merit the approbation of all.

R. M. JOHNSON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SATURDAY, Feb. 11, 1837.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, after some conversation between that gentleman, the CHAIR, and Mr. BRIGGS, the journal was amended as to strike therefrom the reasons given by Mr. ADAMS yesterday for declining to vote on any question affecting Reuben M. Whitney.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. THOMAS, on leave, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President elect, and apprise him that, in conformity with the mode prescribed in the Constitution, it had been ascertained that that gentleman was elected President of the United States for four years, commencing on the fourth of March next, reported to the House that they had performed that duty, and had received for answer that he desired to express the deep sense he entertained of the distinguished honor which his fellow-citizens had conferred on him, and requested them to assure their respective Houses that they might rely on his unceasing efforts to execute the responsible trust which devolved on him, in a manner most conducive to the public interest.

The report, on Mr. T's motion, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution; which was read:

"Whereas, the vote of the House, taken on the 9th of February, the following resolution, viz: 'Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union,' may be construed into an expression of opinion upon the abstract question of the right of slaves to petition Congress; therefore,

Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the Constitution.

Mr. INGERSOLL sent the following to the Clerk's table to be read:

Resolved, That the honorable John Quincy Adams, having inquired of the Speaker whether it would be in order for him to present a petition purporting to be from certain slaves, and the Speaker having appealed to the House for instruction,

Resolved, That this House cannot receive such petition, without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the Constitution of the United States.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. TAYLOR accepted it as a modification of his own, and then renewed his request to the House to grant him leave to offer it.

Mr. PINCKNEY rose and objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. MANN of New York asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON inquired if the motion to reconsider was not first in order?

The CHAIR replied, that it was competent for the House to give precedence to another question.

Mr. PATTON presumed, then, that the object of this proposition was to postpone the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the resolution on the subject of presenting petitions from slaves.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky suggested whether the propositions of the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania could be in order pending a motion to reconsider another having a direct bearing upon, if not identical with, them?

The CHAIR replied that that was a matter of which the House itself was the sole judge. The motion made to suspend the rule was strictly in order.

Mr. ASHLEY inquired if it would be in order at that stage to submit an amendment to the proposition?

The CHAIR. It would be in order to amend the proposition after it was before the House, if the House should suspend the rule and agree to receive it.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky suggested that it would be better to move to suspend the rule, to take up the question upon the reconsideration.

The CHAIR could not entertain debate, and he had before stated that the motion to suspend was not open to amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERS had made no motion, but threw out, as a suggestion, what he thought would be the best course.

Mr. LEWIS inquired if the vote of the 9th should be reconsidered, whether the resolution rejected by that vote would be open to amendment.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. LEWIS hoped that the question would be first taken, for it would answer the same purpose.

Mr. PINCKNEY urged the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion, and move to take up the question of reconsideration.

Mr. TAYLOR would yield to the wishes of members, and accordingly assented, withdrew his motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of submitting his own resolution, and made a similar motion to take up the question of reconsideration.

This motion to take up prevailed, and the question then recurring upon reconsidering the vote by which the following resolution was rejected:

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present to the House any petition from the slaves in this Union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the Southern States, and unfriendly to the Union.

Mr. LANE said: He had moved the reconsideration of the vote taken upon the first resolution, for the purpose of substituting one less equivocal in its character; a resolution not susceptible of any and every possible construction—that shall vanish all doubt from the mind of the good man and the patriot—that shall not arm the fanatic of the North, or the discontented politician of the South, with weapons to disturb the public repose.

That before he proceeded to assign the reasons which had induced this course, he desired the indulgence of the House while he should set himself right before his constituents, the House, and the country, in relation to this subject. It was one upon which his opinion had been made up long before he had a seat in this hall; and since which he had seen nothing, heard nothing, to shake, much less change it, either in reference to the power of Congress, or its duty, in its action, upon abolition petitions.

That Congress have no power to interfere with slavery, as it exists in the States, is a proposition too clear to admit of a doubt. The wildest fanatic does not claim this power on the part of Congress.

That Congress does possess that power over the subject, in the District of Columbia, to the same extent with the States, in their respective jurisdictions, to his mind, was equally true. That, while he honestly entertained this opinion, he was free to state that its exercise, to any extent, would be injurious to that species of property, in the hands of the owners in the neighborhood of the District, and fearfully dangerous to the tranquility of the Union.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) what do these petitioners, called abolitionists, and, by way of contempt, fanatics, but whom he would call, whether male or female, the citizens of the United States, call upon Congress to do, to abolish slavery as it exists in the States? No, sir. To interfere with it in any manner in the States? Certainly not. They set forth that, in their opinion, slavery, in the abstract, is a great moral, political, and religious evil, and pray its abolishment in the District of Columbia, together with the slave trade—a traffic carried on, within the District, as inhuman as it is disgraceful to the American people. That as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, he had examined the jail—the common property of the people of every portion of this Union; and to his surprise he found that prison the common receptacle for the safe-keeping of slaves bought up in the neighboring States by the dealers in human flesh, and there detained until the master or an agent shall find it convenient to drive them to a southern market; and all this without regard to comfort or convenience. In one instance he found in a damp loathsome room of eight feet square, a mother and six or seven children; nor is this all, within this District are private prisons, into which they are driven in droves, and kept for weeks and months, and then shipped to the south. This, all this cruelty, this loathsome suffering, this inhuman traffic, is carried on in open day, in presence of the American people, at the seat of liberty and boasted freedom. It is to abolish this cruel, this disgraceful trade, those petitioners humbly and respectfully pray you to abolish. To this end, to remedy this evil, Mr. L. said, as a member of this House, he would receive these petitions, refer them, and act upon them promptly and effectively. He would treat them kindly and combat their errors with reason. Mr. LANE said he did not intend in these remarks to include the individual who should purchase a slave or slaves, for his own use, or part with those for which he had no use.

Mr. L. said, upon the resolution rejected, reconsidered, and now a substitute proposed, he had but little to say. He had voted against its adoption, moved its reconsideration, and would now vote most cheerfully for its substitute.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) says he voted for the resolution, because by punishing a member for presenting a petition from slaves, was conclusive they had no right to petition; while Mr. L. had voted against it for the reason that its adoption presupposed a right in the slave to petition. If no such right existed, why resolve that it should be a crime to present? Why not resolve at once the absence of the right?

Sir, it is remarkable that an honorable gentleman from South Carolina alive to this subject, should have presented to this House a resolution so equivocal in its language, so doubtful in its character. What is the language? what the meaning, what the construction it would have received if adopted?

Resolved, That any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this Union, ought to be considered as regardless of the feelings of the House, the rights of the southern States, and unfriendly to the Union.

It provided that any member who shall hereafter present any petition from the slaves of this Union. The plain and inevitable inferences to be drawn from this sentence are, first, that the members of this House have been in the habit of presenting such petitions; secondly, that it had been lawful to do so; and lastly, the slave not only possessed such right, but had exercised it.

Sir, had this resolution been adopted, and trust me, you would have seen the disappointed and ambitious politicians of the South, if any such there are, fanning the flame of discontent; yes, upon every stump, at every muster, in every hall, sounding the alarm, danger, danger, disunion. The resolution would have been tortured into any, and every possible meaning, to prove any and every thing. It would have been rightly denounced at the south as loosening, instead of drawing the cord upon the slave.

The South would have been in a political flame: in the North the politicians would have blown the tide of abolition to its height, and all brought to bear upon the administration.

In the face of all this, the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) says the rejection of such a resolution has driven the South to the fearful precipice of disunion: that they tread upon volcanoes.

Sir, it was the rejection of that resolution which has saved them from the precipice, and calmed the troubled spirit of the volcano.

Let honorable gentlemen from the South join with their real, not pretended friends; let them go with him and those with whom he acted—with the friends of the Constitution, of the Union, of liberty, of equal rights—with the democratic party, the friends of the administration, in the adoption of a resolution, in its language pointed, in its meaning clear and obvious. A resolution that all who see, hear or read it, shall understand it as one man—that the slaves of this Union have no right to petition Congress for the abolition of slavery.

Such a resolution will be understood in the South, and will be satisfactory to all. The fanatics of the North cannot pervert it, nor the honest abolitionist evade it.

Mr. L. said, in conclusion, that now, the event having passed, without being in any degree affected by this exciting subject, and with reference to which much of the past excitement may be attributed, he hoped, for the tranquillity of the nation, of the business of this House, the resolution now proposed in the place of the one on a former day rejected, would be adopted, with such a majority as shall speak peace to the South, and that cannot be misunderstood at the North.

Mr. LANE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY said he had voted against the resolution then under consideration, and he should be obliged to do so again if, without the modification, the question upon it should be again taken. Mr. A. was not in his seat when this unfortunate subject was first introduced in the House, but he was near at hand, and indistinctly heard the gentleman from Massachusetts when he addressed the Chair. Learning, from a friend near at hand, that a proposition was made to submit to the House a petition from slaves, praying the abolition of slavery, Mr. A. resumed his seat, when several resolutions were submitted, proposing to bring the gentleman, from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) to the bar of the House for an alleged contempt, for having submitted the supposed abolition petition. Not for a moment, supposing there could be any misapprehension as to the purport of the petition, or as to the shape in which it was communicated to the House, Mr. A. found himself partaking in what seemed to be the common feeling of its members, to support the dignity of the House; and Mr. A. felt disposed to go as far as any other member to effect that object—even to the expulsion of the member who had offered the supposed indignity, should the circumstances of the case, on a full investigation, justify that extreme. But, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. A.) you may well imagine my surprise. After consuming almost the whole day in an effort to bring the matter to issue, the paper in question was ascertained not to be a petition from slaves for the abolition of slavery, but a paper purporting to be a petition from twenty-two slaves of the District of Columbia, praying the expulsion of the gentleman from Massachusetts from the House of Representatives. A hoax no doubt practised upon the gentleman from Massachusetts by some wag of Washington, in consequence of the gentleman's zeal in behalf of abolition petitions. Sir, said Mr. A. I was surprised, and no less mortified, to find myself engaged in such a farce, if I may be permitted to give it that name. Yes, sir, I would call it a farce; and I admonish my friends from the south, as well as the north, not to change its title and character, by their over zeal, for the worse; that is to say, not to proceed on this all important and delicate subject so as at length to entitle it to another name, a deep and direful tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. A.) the facts of the case having been disclosed to the House, I was of opinion that the several propositions then on your table, touching the matter in question, should have been swept from it, leaving the gentleman from Massachusetts in possession of his petition or paper, to dispose of the same on his own responsibility, without any further action of the House on this subject, unless the course of that or some other member should require it. But sir, said Mr. A. it was otherwise determined by the House; a vote was taken on the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, and, without affording him an opportunity to explain the course he felt himself bound to take, the previous question interposing and cutting off all further debate, he (Mr. A.) was bound to vote against it. His object in then occupying the floor, was to say, in part, what he intended to say before the vote of the preceding day on the resolution, and to protest against a construction put on the rejection of the resolution by some gentlemen, to wit: that its rejection implied the right thereafter of any member to introduce a petition from slaves. Mr. A. said he denied the ground: the premises upon which such construction is based are not tenable.

He (Mr. A.) would be one of the last members in the House to give any vote that could be so construed. He was not only in favor of rejecting petitions to Congress from slaves, but had gone as far as the farthest in rejecting petitions to Congress for the abolition of slavery, as the journals of that House of the 9th and 10th of January last would show. He (Mr. A.) took the broad ground, that Congress had no control over the subject—that it belonged exclusively to the States in which the evil, if you will, exists; and that any action of Congress on the subject is improper. It should be left to the States holding slaves to take such course in reference to the abolition of slavery, as their own feelings and interests might dictate; and Mr. A. thought that was the most effectual course to reach the object of the people of the north, who seemed so desirous to abolish slavery.

Mr. A. had another objection to the resolution referred to, he could not think the case of the gentleman from Massachusetts, justified the odium which would be cast upon him, by the adoption of that resolution, nor was he (Mr. A.) disposed to prescribe any degree of punishment for a contempt to, or disorderly conduct in that House, on the part of any one of its members, until the case should occur. If it should become his painful duty to act on such a case, he would be found to act as promptly as any member, and should then exercise his own judgment, according to the extent and nature of the offence, without reference to previous rules or resolutions of the House, which might be connected with the same subject, but differ materially in their nature and extent.

Mr. A. said he had other objections to the resolution, but he would not now longer detain the House. Thus far he felt it his duty to submit his views on the subject, to prevent false impressions in reference to his vote on the resolution; any thing further, should it become necessary at any time, he would willingly submit to those to whom alone he felt responsible for his action on the subject under consideration. Mr. A. was in hopes the resolution would be so modified, as to bear only on the abstract question as to the right of slaves to petition Congress, and he cared not how strong it was, he would vote for it, although he regretted the question had been introduced at all.

Mr. PARKER raised the point of order whether, as the question of reconsideration recurred, the demand for the previous question, originally moved on the resolution, did not recur with it?

The CHAIR decided otherwise, and that the motion to reconsider stood alone without any reference to the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave his reasons at length who he had voted against the resolution, which it was now proposed to reconsider. He had voted against it because he would have considered the adoption of it a denunciation on that floor of those who conceived it to be their duty to present all petitions, let them come from whomsoever they might; the adoption of it would have been denouncing all persons entertaining such opinions, however mistaken they might be, as inimical to the Union; and another reason why he had voted against it was that he considered it as violating the spirit of the Constitution of the country, which provided that no one should be held amenable for any thing said on the floor. He disclaimed all intention, by his vote against this resolution, of admitting the right of slaves to petition Congress, and said he had endeavored to get the floor to explain, before the vote was taken, but was prevented by the operation of the rules of the House. He intended, if he had obtained the floor, to offer a resolution declaring it as the sense of the House, that slaves had not the constitutional right to petition Congress.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said, believing that members perfectly understood the simple question of reconsideration, and that they would have a better opportunity of discussing the question which would immediately follow the question of reconsideration; he therefore moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. LEE had made up his mind, and could not withdraw the motion.

The previous question was seconded by the House—ayes 108, noes not counted; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The ayes and nays having been ordered on the main question, which was on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was rejected, were—yeas 159, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Chilton Allan, Anthony, Ashley, Barten, Bean, Bell, Black, Booke, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Burns, Byam, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. So the vote was reconsidered.

[When the roll had been called through, Mr. CRAIG rose in his place, and stated that he was out of his seat at the moment when his name was called, though he returned to it the instant thereafter, and he asked leave to record his vote in the affirmative; but it was objected to.]

The resolution being then before the House;

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend it by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following: "That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the Constitution."

Mr. PICKENS addressed the House at some length in opposition to the proposed amendment. He considered it an evasion of the question, and hoped that southern men would not aid in this evasion. He believed if the vote was to be taken over again on the resolution now reconsidered, it would be the same that it was when it was rejected, and that the amendments proposed were mere evasions of the question. Besides this, he considered that vote as a true exponent of the will of the constituents of those gentlemen who had voted on that occasion, and he felt it to be his duty not to vote on a question which could lead to nothing but delusion. He was of opinion, from information received on the floor, that the abolitionists were increasing in numbers, and that the vote which was given the other day met their views, and as an evidence of this he referred to the proceedings now going on in Pennsylvania, at an abolition convention now in session at Harrisburg. He did not believe that any one should be trammelled by what he had said, but he could not and he would not vote on any question of this kind, as he never could be an aider and abettor of those who desired to evade a question so important as this.

Mr. INGERSOLL submitted the following amendment to the substitute offered by Mr. TAYLOR. Strike out all after the word "That," and insert the following: "the honorable John Quincy Adams having inquired of the Speaker whether it would be in order for him to present a petition purporting to be from certain slaves, and the Speaker having appealed to the House for instructions,

Resolved, That this House cannot receive such petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL said: The amendment proposed, Mr. Speaker, is offered in spirit of tranquility and peace. Next to the desire which should influence every member of this House to give his vote according to the dictates of a conscientious judgment, is that of giving it with the hope of reconciling conflicting sentiments, and re-producing harmony when it has been disturbed. We are informed of angry feelings, of agitated, and excited minds. It is our duty, if we can, to prevent, if possible, their farther aggravation in this House, and the extension of it throughout the country. How is this best to be effected? By meeting the evil at its source; by counteracting the principal and primary mischief. To ascertain where that is, we need only look to the history of the last week. A discussion has been going on which has done no good. It might have been obviated in a moment by a prompt reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. That reply would now terminate what at the beginning it would have prevented. We have reached a practical crisis. It is a practical evil that we wish to correct.

There are many propositions which are not acceptable, and are not adopted, and yet the rejection of them does not imply a negative of all or any of the propositions contained in them. There are truisms which are not rendered the stronger by being legislated on affirmatively, or the weaker by a negative vote. If, for example, it should be proposed to resolve that a republican form of government is the best; that this Union ought to be preserved; that it is hoped this Capitol will stand; that we desire to be a free, happy, and united people, no one will question the soundness of the propositions, yet not a member of the House would feel disposed to vote for any of them. They are not practical, and for that reason they are not useful. The question now at issue is mainly between theory and practice. We must meet the inquiry which has been made sooner or later, and I propose to meet it in the form which the substitute I have offered presents. The petition cannot be received, whether it be a jest, or otherwise, without compromising the dignity of the House. It aims at no useful end. It attempts the correction of no grievance. It cannot be received, because it would interfere with the rights of those to whom service and labor are due by the individuals who have forwarded it, and declared themselves to stand in that relation. It cannot be received, because in this interference it strikes at all those parts of the Constitution which recognise the system of slavery in the several States of the Union where it exists according to their chosen policy.

Mr. VANDERPOEL of N. Y. said he congratulated the House and the whole country, that this important and agitating subject was about to assume such a shape, as that all, or nearly all, portions of the House, might and would unite in doing and declaring something that the crisis demanded. He had voted for the original resolution which was rejected day before yesterday, and the vote to reject, which had just been reconsidered. In voting for it, he had no difficulties or scruples to overcome. He believed in one and all of the propositions which it either expressed or implied. He would be ashamed of himself, if he ever could have supposed that slaves had a right to petition this body, or any legislative body of any State where slavery exists; nor had he any doubt of the soundness or justness of the proposition, that if any gentleman should hereafter present a petition from slaves, he would justly expose himself to the displeasure, if not the censure of this House. The idea that slaves had a right to petition the American Congress was indeed too monstrous to justify any labored attempt at refutation, but at the same time, he was well satisfied that the vote upon the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Patton,) was not an expression of the sense of a majority of this House upon the abstract right of slaves to petition. He believed, he hoped, for the honor of the nation, that there were not twenty members in this House who believed in the abstract right of slaves to petition Congress. At the same time, he knew that the vote of Thursday, which he, Mr. V. so much deplored, was not a fair exponent of the sense of the majority of this House as to the right of slaves to petition, as would be demonstrated by the vote which would now soon be given. It would be recollected that that resolution, which was just reconsidered, contained some two or three propositions so connected as to be indivisible; propositions in one of which gentlemen might believe, and disbelieve the residue. A gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. Parker) had moved a division of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, so as to get a vote upon each distinct proposition, and the Chair very properly decided, that the resolution was so worded, that if the vote upon the first proposition were taken, no distinct independent substantive proposition would be left, and the resolution was not therefore susceptible of division. It was to be swallowed then as one unbroken dose. Many gentlemen to his (Mr. V.'s) knowledge, had voted against it, because they supposed it involved a very severe censure upon the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) others voted against it, because it impeached, in advance, as they supposed, the motives of some honorable member of this House, who under some very peculiar circumstances might hereafter deem it a duty to present a petition from a slave. As a whole, therefore, they voted against it, though, as I well know, they believed that slaves have constitutionally no right to petition Congress. And yet the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) has told us that he did not vote upon the motion to reconsider, because he believes that the vote of Thursday was a fair exponent of the sense of a majority of this House upon the abstract right of slaves to petition! The gentleman's course was, no doubt, a conscientious one; but he entreated him to review a resolution which, he (Mr. V.) feared he had too precipitately formed. Was the stand he had taken kind to those gentlemen of the north who had for the two last years so firmly co-operated with us here and elsewhere, in all measures that were calculated to frustrate the mischievous doings of northern abolitionists? Was it not any thing but charitable? I tell the gentleman that I know, because they have told me so, that many gentlemen from the north voted in the majority on Thursday, because they supposed that the resolution then negatively, implied a severe imputation upon the motives of the gentleman from Massachusetts. And does he still adhere to the sentiment that that resolution is a fair exponent of the sense of the majority of this House, and is he still unwilling to aid gentlemen in any effort they may make to set themselves right before this House and this nation? Suppose that whole numbers of northern gentlemen should rise in their places and tell us that they did not believe in the right of slaves to petition, but that they voted in the negative on Thursday, because the resolution, then under consideration, implied, as they supposed, a most unmerited and cruel impeachment of the motives of an honorable member of this House, would the gentleman from South Carolina still pertinaciously adhere to his faith? Would he still persist in the course he had prescribed for himself? He appealed to that gentleman's high sense of justice, and he appealed to his regard for the past efforts of northern gentlemen to that great southern interest which was assailed by the petitions with which fanatics were constantly pestering us. Sir, said Mr. V. I will not impeach the motives which have influenced any gentleman in the course they have seen fit to pursue in relation to this agitating subject. They are doubtless patriotic. But I will take occasion to say, that as a northern man, opposed with all my soul to the mad schemes of the northern abolitionists, and feeling the full weight of obligation that rests upon me to fulfil that sacred compact of the Constitution—not to interfere with the domestic relations of our southern brethren—my incentives to duty have by no means been strengthened by the speeches, the doctrines, and the propositions of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) and of other southern gentlemen who have advocated his policy, his views, and his measures, upon this subject. We have for the last two years heard much here to try our patience, if not to abate our zeal in the good cause. We had heard entirely too much of blood and disunion; too much hurrying of defiance, to afford us encouragement, to stimulate us to renewed vigor in the path of duty. Sir, there are many southern gentlemen who do not seem to appreciate our position at the north. We now have, and always will have, fools and fanatics there, as well as elsewhere. We know we can keep them in subjection, if their arms are not nerved, and their ranks are not thickened, by the indifference of our southern brethren. It is at the north where the battle against the abolitionists is to be fought. We will do the work for you, my friends from the south, nobly and gallantly; but in the name of justice, cheer and encourage us with your kindness and friendship, instead of irritating us with menace, with denunciation, and ebullitions of defiance. Do not propose measures so harsh and unreasonable, as to drive from us any of that great moral thinking mass of northern population, that now sustains and encourages us in our efforts to put down the abolitionists. Think, gentlemen, before you speak; look before you leap. Recollect that the boldest measures are not always the wisest and most politic measures.

Do not unconsciously play into the hands of northern incendiaries, by asking us to vote for propositions which our constituents of the north may regard as violations of the Constitution. Do not ask us to deny to freemen the right of petition, however deluded they may be. Be assured that you are not, by such a course, subserving the great interest you have so near at heart. It is calculated to increase our difficulties at home, and reinforce the enemy you wish us to subdue. I conjure southern gentlemen to think of, to appreciate, these considerations. They are dictated by a spirit of friendship, by a spirit of fidelity to the Constitution. Think you not that harsh speeches and harsh measures operate against your cause? An honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pinckney,) in the ardor of debate, had resorted to a simile, which, if true, might rather have been waived. He told us that he would as soon believe that a cow or a horse, a dog or a cat, had a right to petition, as that a negro slave had a right to petition this House. Speeches like these, and measures that are akin to them, furnish texts from which abolitionists will write and preach whole volumes. Let southern gentlemen temper their valor with a little discretion, and, my word for it, all will yet be well. We of the north, the great mass of the north, will fulfil the compact to the letter and spirit. We recognised your property in slaves when we entered into solemn covenant and union with you. We solemnly agreed that slaves should form part of the basis of your representation on this floor; and, until we become wretches, and wholly insensible to the obligations of covenant and duty, we will FAITHFULLY FULFIL THE COMPACT.

It was necessary that he should say a few words as to the right of slaves to petition. He was surprised that any intelligent gentleman had seriously contended for this right. It was wholly inconsistent with the idea of property in slaves, which all who understood the relation of master and slave must admit to exist. A slave is not a citizen in the eye of the Constitution. His political existence is merged in that of his master. He cannot prosecute in your courts of justice; he cannot petition your legislative assemblies. Sir, I know enough of the sentiments of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, to feel assured, that before slavery was abolished in New York, a proposition to present a petition from slaves to the New York Legislature, would have been regarded as an insult. It would have awakened there as great a measure of indignation as has here been exhibited within the last five days. Sir, what has the Legislature of New York lately done to indicate its abhorrence of the movements of modern abolitionists? A petition was there very recently presented to enlarge the political rights of free negroes; emanating, no doubt, from the same sources that are constantly agitating us here; and co-instanti that it was presented, its prayer was indignantly rejected by an almost unanimous vote of the popular branch of the New York Legislature. There was little or no sympathy for abolitionists there. New York is sound to the core upon this subject; and he had no fear that she would ever become otherwise.

An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) had favored us with a very eloquent and able speech a few days ago, but the great defect of it was, that it did not meet the true question. Admit that the right of petition is pre-existent to, and independent of, the Constitution, the question still recurs, whether it is not to freemen, and to freemen alone, that it attaches. The Constitution secures to the people the right peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances. Had any one, before to day, ever dreamed that the appellation of "the people" embraced slaves? Sir, I hesitate not to declare that, were I a southern man, I would not submit to the doctrine, that slaves have a right to petition, if Congress were ever mad enough to sanction it. Nay, I go further, and declare, that, as a northernman, I would not submit to it. I would not brook the degradation of listening to and entertaining that which it belongs to freemen alone to address to us. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had fancied and stated some cases, in which it might be expedient to entertain a petition from a slave. Sir, said Mr. V. I could have hoped that that gentleman was too sound a logician to suppose, that extreme and far-fetched cases against a proposition prove its unsoundness. On the contrary the maxim "Excepiat probat regulam," was a sound maxim of law and philosophy. The gentleman had supposed the case of a slave wandering or driven into a foreign country, and there cruelly oppressed. He asks, would you not entertain a petition for his relief? Suppose, sir, you should here pass a broad and sweeping resolution, that petitions should not be received from slaves, and that any gentleman, who should thereafter present such petition would be regarded as insulting the House. Suppose, that after this, a gentleman should rise in his place and state that he had received a petition from an American slave in a foreign country, who was there most cruelly oppressed; that he had endeavored to find his master, but had not been able to find him; that he submitted it, most respectfully, to the House to determine whether it would receive such petition; and the House were to determine, as matter of grace and favor, that the petition should be received. Would this extreme case prove the unsoundness of the general proposition, that slaves have constitutionally no right to petition? No, sir; it would not militate against the soundness of the general rule. But even, in such a case, the proper course would be for the slave to lay his case before our minister or consul abroad. Let the minister or consul communicate the facts to your Executive, and if he regards it as a case requiring legislative interposition, let him communicate it to Congress. I deny, therefore, that even under such extreme circumstances, a slave would, as matter of strict right, have a right directly to petition Congress. And was it indeed so very strange that this right of petition was not an universal right? He appealed to his friends and colleagues from the north, whether there were not some persons in our section of the Union legally incapable of petitioning even your courts of justice. An infant, a person under twenty-one years of age, can there only petition a judicial tribunal by his guardian or next friend. Tell me not then that the right of petition to courts of justice, or legislative bodies, is a universal right; that it is not modified or limited by the laws and relations of society. He would not longer discuss this point. He had already dwelt too long upon it. To discuss it was paying too much respect to it. It was a point which he could have hoped would never have been mooted in an American Congress.

He had said that he had heard too many threats of blood and disunion since he had had the honor of a seat here. Had we been told that the Potomac would soon be the dividing line, and that its waters would be crimsoned with blood? These threats had ceased to frighten any body. When he (Mr. V.) first entered this House, he always felt an awful, agonizing sensation when gentlemen presented to us the dreadful alternative of disunion! But, sir, it had no power longer to shake his nerves. He had become used to it; for it had become quite an old story. Threats of disunion had become as familiar here as household words. Gentlemen almost daily talked about setting up for themselves, "as flippantly as maids do talk of puppy dogs," and no one was longer disturbed by it. He would not longer permit himself to be troubled with the apprehension of even the possibility of disunion. The north, though it had a few weak and deluded men, and officious women, would sacredly regard and faithfully fulfil all the obligations that resulted from the "Union." There was patriotism enough at the North, and patriotism and discretion enough at the South, to save this glorious fabric of our Union. Delusion and fanaticism would have only a brief and harmless career.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana could not believe that a majority of the members who had voted to reject the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia the other day intended to express the opinion that slaves had the right to petition; but there seemed to be a great contrariety of opinion on the subject, and a number of gentlemen thought that by implication the rejection of that resolution went to affirm that slaves had the right to petition. He had never entered into a discussion on this subject, because he did not believe that it could lead to any good result; but on the contrary would do a great deal of evil. He did consider, however, that if the House recognised the right of slaves to petition, that the Union was virtually dissolved, and when that day came, he should feel it to be his duty to leave that House, and go home to his constituents. Entertaining these views, he would ask of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to accept as a part of his resolution, to come in at the end thereof, the words "and endangering this Union."

Mr. ANTHONY hoped his colleague would not accept of this modification, because they had heard too much about endangering the Union.

Mr. INGERSOLL said, he could not accept of the modification.

Mr. PATTON then addressed the House at some length, in support of his original propositions.

Mr. INGERSOLL modified his amendment, by omitting the name of Mr. Adams, and inserting "an honorable member from Massachusetts."

An inquiry having been made, by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, whether a paper, which he held in his hand, purporting to be a petition from certain slaves, and declaring themselves slaves, came within the order of the House of the 15th of January, and the said paper not having been received by the Speaker, he stated that, in a case so extraordinary and novel, he would take the advice and counsel of the House.

Resolved, That this House cannot receive the said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND spoke at some length in explanation of the vote he had given. He had voted against this resolution; but, because of his doing so, it did not follow that he was in favor of receiving petitions from slaves. He had voted against it, because the resolution involved a question of censure on the gentleman from Massachusetts, and he put it to gentlemen whether it would not be the better means of getting a large vote on this subject, to take it on the bare question presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, on the reception of the petition purporting to be from slaves. If that question was met he doubted not they would obtain very nearly a unanimous vote against the reception of the petition. That was the question which ought to be met, and he was sorry to see gentlemen running off after a new question.

Mr. BYNUM did not rise to make a speech on this occasion, but merely to inform the House, that at this time the individual who had been ordered to be brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, was now in attendance, prepared to be heard, and he hoped gentlemen would bring this debate to a close at as early a period as practicable, so that a citizen might not be kept in custody longer than was actually necessary. Mr. B. then made a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from New York (Mr. Vanderpoel) and read an extract from a southern paper stating that a committee of the Legislature of Louisiana had reported in favor of calling a southern convention, to take some measures to counteract the efforts of the abolitionists.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said he regretted to differ from his honorable colleague (Mr. Pickens) on any question of such interest to the south as the one immediately pending; but he felt it due to those gentlemen who had shown a disposition to meet this question, to say that he was satisfied with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ingersoll) because he believed it covered all the material points, if not the whole ground. Although he did not feel authorized to take the responsibility of accepting it as a modification of his resolution, still he would consider himself justified in voting for the amendment. He was glad to give gentlemen from the north the opportunity of setting themselves right on this subject; and although he might be disposed under certain circumstances to cavil for the ninth part of a hair, yet he would consider himself as doing that which was most improper, if he were to split hairs on a question like the present, a question of pacification. He considered it to have been his duty to have said thus much, and if he had not mistaken the general sentiment of the south, they would respond to it.

Mr. HOWARD moved reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution of yesterday directing Mr. Whitney to be brought before the bar of the House, was adopted; which motion was entered, and lies over. It being a privileged question, was entertained by the CHAIR and recorded.

Mr. BOULDIN said: I have a desire to say something, though not a great deal, on the momentous and awful subject now before the House. I have a personal interest in the issue to be determined here, not very inconsiderable to myself, but falling into utter insignificance when compared with the consequences which may and must follow the decision now to be made. I have said and have agreed upon that opinion and belief, that there was no considerable number of the members of this House willing to take any steps or measures, direct or indirect, against the slaveholding people, through the power or authority of the House, going to destroy the right of property in negro slaves, or to endanger the slave or slave owner, in any account in that regard. I said it at the last session, and reiterated it again on Monday last, when this question arose. I said so from my entire conviction of its truth, and from the bottom of my heart. I knew there were societies and private associations, and private opinions and wishes, on both sides of the Potomac of a different character, but I did not believe that they had attained an official and legislative form and substance, until the vote which is now the subject of reconsideration. I did say upon that vote would depend the question whether my faith would be confirmed, impaired, or entirely annihilated. I know that for that opinion I am responsible to my constituents, and all who confide in me, or have any claims upon me; so far as my personal interest extends.

It is with the deepest regret, the most mournful reflections that I am compelled to say I had been constrained to come to the conclusion, that in this, I had been entirely in the wrong. I have been obliged to conclude, from that vote, that a majority of this House were deliberately and fatally of opinion that a slave has the right to petition this House.

From this proposition, if true, a corollary follows, as conclusively and inevitably as a corollary follows from a demonstration of any proposition in Euclid, that the Constitution of the United States is no effective barrier to the action of Congress on the right of property in a negro slave to alter or abolish it.

This has filled my mind with the melancholy anticipations of all its natural and awful consequences; and this is the general understanding, as far as I am informed, of the meaning and import of that vote which has caused so much dissatisfaction in so many who are interested—so many of the slaveholding community.

I have heard and am cheered with hope that such is not the construction put on this vote by many who voted, and have been thus understood. The motion to reconsider would seem to indicate that this hope is not entirely unfounded.

In the few considerations that I shall throw out, let me then avoid every thing that is calculated to irritate and unsettle the deliberate judgment of gentlemen in the decision they shall now make upon this momentous question, so full of consequences of fearful import. Let me not throw out any thing that wears the appearance of a threat, or any single word that addresses itself to passion of any kind.

Sir, let not the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Sutherland,) imagine that any question of order, or any question as to time and manner of introducing this subject, can materially affect the impression that this vote will make. Knowing that my own confidence was greater than is common to gentlemen of the South, and knowing that that confidence is shaken to its foundations, I cannot but feel that the confidence of others, less firm than my own, must be shaken also.

Although the doctrines of the abolitionists give good cause for uneasiness, and although the late proposition in another branch of this legislature, to incorporate the Colonization Society in this district is far more calculated to create uneasiness; yet both together, and all that has happened before, bear no comparison to the belief that Congress will assume the ground that they may receive the petitions of slaves; that the Constitution is no security for the property in negro slaves. Nothing can satisfy us while we are even left in doubt on this question. The point has been made and seriously urged, not only by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) but by others also, that a slave has the right to petition. The venerable and distinguished gentleman has urged that a slave in the streets of Constantinople, may petition the Grand Seigneur, or Grand Mogul, and that he dare not refuse to listen to him, and therefore infers that a slave may petition Congress; if he can prove that Congress are the masters of the slaves, here his cases might be analogous. He has referred to the right of a British subject to petition. In that case all are free. He has urged that the right to petition is older than, and paramount to the Constitution. All this goes to show, if it shows any thing, that the Constitution does not secure the property in a slave. The Constitution was formed to protect person and property. This argument places the whole South, person and property, under the discretion, and at the mercy of a majority of Congress, and like the Grand Seigneur in Constantinople, they may make them all free or slaves at their pleasure.

Mr. Speaker, we have taken an oath to support the Constitution. That Constitution was framed to support this and all other property. If then we appeal to any powers, rights or reasons, above and beyond that instrument, we disregard the bond which is the only obligation and contract between us, and, as it seems to me, with all respect to the opinions of others, we disregard the oaths we have taken to support it. It is in vain to put the case of a slave condemned to be hanged for crime, and applying for pardon, with no one to apply to but us. In such a case he is out of the power, custody, and protection of his master, and is not the subject of property. Any general proposition that slaves can petition cannot be maintained in this way. The law makes provision how he may be pardoned without applying here. The faith and confidence of the south cannot be restored by extravagancies of this sort.

We must come to the simple question—Do you, the majority, mean that our slaves can petition Congress? If so, say so; plainly, calmly, and promptly. If not, say the reverse, and let us know what you mean. It is due to us, and to yourselves, that you should be now understood upon this point. I hope that you will not answer to this inquiry under any party drill, as is supposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) but that you will give us your real opinion. I, like that gentleman, wish the South to know, since this question, never before thought of, as far as I know, has been raised, the exact truth, I wish the South to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. I do not wish, by any irritating, provoking or even vindictive, and much less by appealing to the tender feelings of kindness and sympathy, to aggravate or appease any passion or feeling, but to get from the House a cool and deliberate expression of opinion on this point.

I can assure the gentleman from South Carolina, that my course has not been produced by any drill on either side. I am certain, however, that even this question has been made, and I fear will continue to be made, subject to the inveterate party feelings heated to frenzy. In such a state of things nothing is sacred. I know there are those in this country of all political sects who are willing to make any use of this subject of negro slavery. I am and have been daily sensible of these operations going on around me, and see their effects.

Sir, the very moment the gentleman from Massachusetts put his question, I felt it, and saw it in all its sad consequences: I felt nothing but sorrow and sadness. When the Chair announced to the House that it was a question of novelty and difficulty, I felt surprise and even astonishment. I thought it was so easy to have escaped any further trouble about it. Not much acquainted with questions of order, I became somewhat resigned to this, and felt still nothing but sorrow that such a firebrand should have been thrown in among us, mingled with a dread of its consequences, until a gentleman from New York (the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) attempted to make sport, and turn it off as a "hoax" or a "joke," originating in the South. Sir, this produced in me feelings of any kind rather than what had prevailed with me before. If the gentleman from Massachusetts was "hoaxed," it was his misfortune; but that was no reason why an attempt should be made to "hoax us" in so solemn and serious a matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Sutherland) relied upon this as some excuse for the introduction of this monstrous proposition in this House. Gentlemen all, and surely a gentleman who has stood as high, and deservedly so, as the Ex-President, must be taken to be serious, when they make from their places propositions of this, or indeed of any kind, be they what they may. When, then, a gentleman occupying a place as high in this House and this country as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, proposed to treat the subject with levity, and justify the introduction of a paper of that kind into this House, and a proposition so fraught with mischief, upon the ground that some one from the South had played a trick on the gentleman from Massachusetts, I was struck with surprise, as well as with other emotions that I need not now express in terms. There are things of which sport cannot be made; and this is one of them. What would you think of a man that would attempt to make fun of death? As well might gentlemen undertake to do that.

The ladies of the North appear to be very anxious about their sisterhood at the South. God bless them, sir, I wish them all happiness, North and South, in whatever situation they may be found. Let me not say a word to wound or offend them; but I am persuaded they give themselves a great deal of unnecessary trouble about us. As they seem to have set out as valiant chevaliers, determined to break a lance in defence of the oppressed, it is probable that any appeal to them looking like a regard to their own interest, would be coldly received; yet I would modestly say to them that, living among the people myself, I have some chance to know something about the effect likely to be produced in the South by their interference; and I am afraid the benefits will not be as great as they suppose. I will say, sir, to the gentlemen and ladies of the North, and to the gentlemen from that quarter in this House, and especially to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Sutherland,) who last spoke, that I neither ask nor desire the sympathy of the North, or of him, so kindly expressed, but that, in fixing their eyes upon our dangers and perils, they are very prone to forget their own. They all seem to forget that, while they kindle up strife, rebellion, and civil war, as they think, only in the South, and weep over it, the flame they are kindling may reach their own dwellings—ay, sir, may break out first in their own quarters. While they fix their imaginations upon kindling faggots and smoking habitations in the South, the real flame may appear bursting loose from their own bedchambers, their own dwellings; and their own wives, husbands, friends and children may be the first and real sufferers. I do not address myself to the fears or passions of any, but to their reason. And, sir, if zeal has left any reason remaining, cannot gentlemen perceive that civil war, division, and disunion, with all their horrid consequences, cannot be confined to one quarter of the Union only. Let me address myself to a consideration that will bring men to reflection, if any thing can—to dollars and cents. If men cannot think of their own wives and children, and the dangers and perils that will befall them on account of their imaginations too strongly dwelling upon the dangers, real or fancied, they think impending over our wives and children, they may be brought to feel, or their hucksters, adorned thousands and millions in manufactories, when a single faggot applied would reduce them all to ashes and smoke in an hour. Do they suppose that there is no discontent in their own country? no combustible matter that would take fire from a spark kindled in the South? However, it is useless to address reason to those whose zeal has caused them to overlook this.

Whether we sit here as brothers, consulting upon the common welfare, happiness, and prosperity of our common family and country, or whether one portion of us is making claims to power never granted over the other; whether the Constitution has any obligatory force to protect our property, seems now about to be decided. I have lived in friendship and at ease, mingling equally with men here from all parts of the Union, and no man has felt more gratefully the kindness and friendship of northern brethren, and acknowledged it more openly or frankly than I have done, or returned it more cordially. Yet, sir, if they claim to hold our property, and consequently our safety and independence, at their discretion, it is but too plain that this claim will produce any other fruit sooner than brotherly love and kindness. That however the personal friendships (no other cause of difference existing) may continue the same, and probably in most instances will continue, still the general and final result will and must be, not the kind and gentle grasp of love and friendship, but the ungente grapple of death, and the issue must be blood. A reflection not more terrible to one than to the other, and not more to either than to all men; but an issue to be deprecated, as should also all things calculated to lead to it, by all men in their sober senses, and from which may God in his mercy shield me, and mine, and my country!

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. WISE, HARRISON of Missouri, ASHLEY, (the last two gentlemen in explanation,) UNDERWOOD, CRAIG, and ANTHONY, (the latter merely urging the House to take the question, as they had already consumed a whole week in a debate which could in no way benefit the country, any portion or section of it, or even a solitary individual.)

Mr. TAYLOR rose amidst loud cries of "question." He said it had been his intention to submit a few remarks to the House in support of his proposition, but he was admonished by the loud calls of "question," and would most cheerfully yield to the expressed wish of the House. His chief object in rising, however, was to state, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania having offered a modification, and Mr. T. having been urged by one of his colleagues to accept it, he had then declined, and he now desired to give a single reason. He had done so for the purpose of waiting to see what the views of other members were, and having listened attentively to the debate in its progress, he had become satisfied that the acceptance of that amendment as a modification of his own, would ensure greater harmony in the House, which being all important in the consideration and disposition of the question, therefore be accepted it.

Mr. T. subsequently explained that in accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he wished, at the same time, to retain also the original resolution, to come in after Mr. Ingersoll's and form, together, one distinct proposition.

Mr. ADAMS then read certain amendments he wished to move, one of which was to insert, where it was referred to, the words of the resolution of the 18th of January, ordering "all petitions, memorials, resolutions and papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery," to be laid on the table, without being printed or referred, and that no further action should be had thereon.

Mr. A. then addressed the House at length, and went on to show that he was in no way responsible for the debate which had occurred. He said he now believed the petition to be a "forgery," designed as a "hoax" upon him, and whatever might be the decision of the House, he should not again attempt to present the petition.

The debate was further continued by Mr. GRANGER, when, Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina accepted the modified amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, as a modification of the original resolution.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question being on the adoption of the resolutions, was ordered without a count.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered.

A division of the question having been ordered, the first resolution, as modified, was then taken up as follows:

An inquiry having been made, by an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, whether a paper, which he held in his hand, purporting to be a petition from certain slaves, and declaring themselves slaves, came within the order of the House of the 18th of January, and the said paper not having been received by the Speaker, he stated that, in a case so extraordinary and novel, he would take the advice and counsel of the House.

Resolved, That this House cannot receive the said petition without disregarding its own dignity, the rights of a large class of citizens of the south and west, and the Constitution of the United States.

The question being taken thereon, it was adopted by a vote of yeas 160, nays 35, as follows:

Resolved, That slaves do not possess the right of petition secured to the people of the United States by the Constitution.

Mr. HALEY moved to lay it on the table; lost, without a division.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided as follows—yeas 162, nays 18.

So the second resolution was adopted.

[When the name of Mr. WISE was called, that gentleman rose in his place and declined to vote for the reason that he held that Congress had no power to interfere, in any way, with the subject of slavery.]

The SPEAKER informed the House that the Sergeant-at-arms, in obedience to the order of the House, and the warrant of the Speaker, had arrested Reuben M. Whitney, who was then in custody, and waiting the order of the House.

Mr. HOWARD said that he had made a motion, in the early part of the day, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution directing the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of Mr. Whitney, had been adopted; and he had done so under the impression that it would facilitate the action of the House on the important public business. Since that time, however, he had been induced to change his mind, and he would therefore withdraw the motion to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. HANNEGAN,

The House then adjourned at a little after 7 o'clock, P. M.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 13, 1837.

Mr. LINN presented a petition from sundry citizens of Missouri, praying the establishment of a mail route from Lexington, in that State, through Johnson, Rives and Benton counties, to Springfield, in Greene county; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a memorial from the Mayor and Board of Aldermen of the city of St. Louis, protesting against and praying that no claim to land within the common of St. Louis be conferred; referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of — McNair of Pittsburgh, mail contractor, praying to be compensated for extra services rendered by him; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CALHOUN presented two petitions, praying for the establishment of additional mail routes; referred to the same committee.

Mr. PARKER presented the memorial of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, and other persons transient visitors at the Seat of Government, praying for the immediate acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the memorial of —; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HUBBARD presented certain papers in support of the claim of the honorable John Forsyth; which were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George Washington Parke Custis, praying to be compensated for damages done to his fisheries below Georgetown, in the Potomac, by the dredging machine employed under an appropriation of Congress.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Sands.

Mr. NORVELL submitted the following resolutions; which were considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the town of St. Joseph, at the mouth of the river St. Joseph, on Lake Michigan.

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands inquire into the expediency of granting to the State of Michigan five hundred thousand acres of public land, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the rivers in that State.

On motion of Mr. WALKER,

The Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John W. Cook; and leave was granted to the petitioner to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Doctor Thomas Carter.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish a port of entry at Jersey City, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize Charles Dana and James R. Butts to import, free of duty, an iron steamboat in detached parts, with the necessary machinery, working tools, &c.; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY,

The Senate took up the bill supplementary to the act to amend the judicial system of the United States; and, after being amended, it was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. RUGGLES,

The Senate took up the bill in addition to the act to promote the progress of science and the useful arts; and, after being amended, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Department of State, transmitting certain documents relative to the claim of the executors of Richard K. Meade; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved that 2,000 extra copies of the President's message on the subject of our relations with Mexico be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved that the Senate take up the resolution which was submitted by him in the early part of the session, relative to acknowledging the independence of Texas; and he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. W. said he regarded this resolution as of more consequence than any thing which could come under the consideration of Congress during the present session. He must press the Senate to act upon it, without the slightest delay, for he was apprehensive that should it be postponed now, it would not be reached again this session. He did not intend to allow an opportunity to pass without obtaining a vote on the resolution. He thought the honor of the country required that Congress should act upon it without loss of time. National justice and national honor demanded that Congress should forthwith proceed to recognise the independence of Texas.

Mr. BENTON opposed the motion on the ground that the bill to increase the army was entitled to a preference, and would come up, if not kept off by a debate in relation to Texas; and, after a brief discussion,

Mr. WALKER's motion was rejected; yeas 12, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Calhoun, Clay, Fulton, Hendricks, King of Georgia, Moore, Mouton, Parker, Preston, Walker, and White—12.

The bill to increase the army of the United States was then taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, together with the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs; and, the amendments being agreed to, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

The bill to establish a foundry and armory in the west and southwest, and depots for arms in certain States and Territories; and, after some remarks from Messrs. BRNTON, SEVIER, and LINN, in support of the bill, and from Mr. CALHOUN against it, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 26, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, Wall, White, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, King of Georgia, Knight, Moore, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, and Swift—11.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill from the House respecting discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and after an explanation from Mr. B. and a few observations from Mr. CLAY, it was ordered to a third reading.

The bill in addition to the act entitled an act for the punishment of crimes against the United States, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCHANAN objected to the punishment of death, provided in the bill for the crime of burning the public buildings, and said he never could vote for the bill while it contained such a provision. He never could sanction the punishment of death, but in the one case authorized by holy writ: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed."

Mr. PRENTISS moved to amend the bill by substituting confinement in the penitentiary at hard labor for not more than twenty nor less than five years, instead of the punishment of death. This amendment was rejected—yeas 9, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Buchanan, Crittenden, Moore, Niles, Prentiss Robinson, Swift, and Walker—9.

NAYS—Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Parker, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Wright—21.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved to amend the bill by substituting imprisonment in the penitentiary for the punishment of death in the case of accessories before the fact; and after some remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN and PARKER in favor of the amendment, and from Mr. GRUNDY against it, it was rejected, yeas 11, nays 17; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Wright—17.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed by the following vote.

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Nicholas, Page, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Crittenden, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, and Walker—10.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MONDAY, February 13, 1837.

MOROCCO.

The CHAIR, on leave, presented the following message, in writing, from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States.

I communicate to Congress printed copies of the treaty of peace and commerce between the United States and the Emperor of Morocco, concluded at Mequinez on the 16th day of September last, and duly ratified by the respective Governments.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, Feb. 9, 1837.

The message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The CHAIR also laid before the House a communication from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a list of balances unsettled by the receivers of public moneys prior to September, 1835; which, on motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The CHAIR also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to the petition and papers of James and William Brooks; which, on motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

REUBEN M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

In pursuance of the following resolution, adopted on Saturday evening last:

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney, now in the hands of the Sergeant-at-arms, be brought to the bar of this House, to answer for an alleged contempt of the House, in peremptorily refusing to appear and give evidence as a witness on a summons, duly issued by a select committee, acting by the authority of this House, under a resolution of the 17th of January last, in the matter of a letter, expressing said refusal, addressed by the said R. M. Whitney to the committee, and by the committee referred to the House; and that he be forthwith furnished with a copy of the report of said committee, and of the letter aforesaid.

The CHAIR accordingly informed the House that Reuben M. Whitney was in attendance, in custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, awaiting the pleasure of the House.

Mr. PATTON moved that the prisoner be forthwith brought to the bar of the House; which was ordered.

Shortly after, Mr. WHITNEY appeared in custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, and was addressed by the Chair as follows:

REUBEN M. WHITNEY: You have been brought before this House, by its order, to answer the charge of an alleged contempt of this House, in having peremptorily refused to give evidence in obedience to a summons duly issued by a committee of this House, which committee had, by an order of the House, power to send for persons and papers.

Before you are called upon to answer in any manner to the subject-matter of this charge, it is my duty, as the presiding officer of this House, to inform you that, by an order of the House, you will be allowed counsel should you desire it. If you have any request to make in relation to this subject, your request will now be received and considered by the House. If, however, you are now ready to proceed in the investigation of the charge, you will state it, and the House will take order accordingly.

Mr. WHITNEY then addressed the Chair, in substance as follows: Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a paper responding to the charge upon which I am arraigned, and beg leave to offer it for the consideration of the House.

The paper was then received, and read to the House as follows.

The undersigned answers that his refusal to attend the committee upon the summons of the chairman, was not intended or believed by him to be disrespectful to the honorable the House of Representatives; nor does he now believe that he thereby committed a contempt of the House.

His reasons for refusing to attend the committee are truly stated in his letter to that committee.

He did not consider himself bound to obey a summons issued by the chairman of that committee.

He had attended in obedience to such a summons before another committee, voluntarily, and without objection to the validity of the process, and would have attended in the same way before the present committee, but for the belief that he might thereby be exposed to insult and violence.

He denies, therefore, that he has committed a contempt of the House, because, 1st. The process upon him was illegal, and he was not bound to obey it; and 2d. Because he could not attend without exposing himself thereby to outrage and violence.

If the House shall decide in favor of the authority of the process, and that the respondent is bound to obey it, then he respectfully asks, in such case, that in consideration of the peculiar circumstances in which he is placed, as known to the House, the committee may be instructed to receive testimony upon interrogatories, to be answered on oath before a magistrate, as has been done in other instances, in relation to other witnesses, or that the committee be instructed to prohibit the use or introduction of secret and deadly weapons in the committee room during the examination of the witnesses. And in case he shall think it necessary, he prays to be heard by counsel, and to be allowed to offer testimony in the matters herein submitted.

R. M. WHITNEY.

The Sergeant at arms was then ordered to take the respondent from the bar, pending the discussion on the ensuing propositions.

After some suggestions from Messrs. HAYNES, PATTON, BOULDIN, and LINCOLN,

Mr. GHOLSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House, in relation to his alleged contempt.

Mr. LINCOLN moved the following amendment: Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert, "That a Committee of Privileges, consisting of _____ members, be appointed and instructed to report the mode of proceeding in relation to Reuben M. Whitney, who is now in custody, awaiting the order of this House, and that said committee have leave to execute the duty assigned them immediately."

Mr. GHOLSON said it appeared to him that they had select committees enough already, for the period of the session, and the matters before the House to be acted upon. Where existed, let him ask, the necessity for raising a committee? All they could do, would be to bring their report before the House, and the House would, when called upon to act on it, be in precisely the same situation they were that morning. He had supposed that the object of bringing Mr. Whitney to the bar was for him to disprove, or to purge himself of an alleged contempt to the House. Well, he has appeared, in obedience to its order, and Mr. G. could see no objection to his setting about immediately to disprove the charge against him, if it was in his power.

Mr. MERCER did most sincerely hope that the House would so far respect its own dignity, as to adhere to its old established forms of proceeding. That form had invariably been the appointment of a committee to direct the mode of proceedings.

Mr. PATTON then renewed the suggestion that the respondent ought to retire during the deliberations of the House on the preliminary proceedings. This had always been the uniform course.

The CHAIR stated that such had been the uniform course in former cases; and believing it to be the sense of the House, he directed the Sergeant-at-arms to take Reuben M. Whitney from the bar, which was done.

Mr. BOULDIN said he wished only to make one suggestion. One proposition of the gentleman, brought before the House, was that he was willing to go before the committee, if that committee would go into the committee room unarmed. He was sure the committee did not wish to go into the room armed. He wished to suggest to the committee and to the House that this would avoid all further trouble about the matter.

Mr. LINCOLN said was it very far from his intention to place himself in the attitude of a prosecutor in this case. The committee had contented themselves, by detailing the circumstances of the refusal of this witness to appear before them without recommending any action on the subject; and because of this course having been pursued by the committee, he (Mr. L.) had come forward the other day, and introduced a proposition directing the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of this witness. He had not intended, after the adoption of this order, to take any further part in the matter, and should not then have arisen to bring before the House another proposition, if it had not been for the fact that no other person present appeared to have turned their attention to the course of proceeding which it would be necessary for the House to adopt on this occasion. In looking into the precedents as to the mode of proceeding in such cases, he had found that it would be necessary, for the purpose of procuring the action of the House on the subject, that some direction should be given by the House, as to the mode of proceeding; because he believed it would be impossible for the House to act on it without some preliminary measures being taken, and for the purpose of indicating the course which he thought should be adopted, he sent to the Chair the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert, "That a Committee of Privileges, consisting of seven members, be appointed and instructed to report the mode of proceeding in relation to Reuben M. Whitney, who is now in custody, awaiting the order of this House, and that said committee have leave to execute the duty assigned them immediately."

Mr. McKAY said, he had voted on Friday last, when the subject was before the House, to require the Speaker to issue his summons to bring Reuben M. Whitney to the bar, and he had done so with a good deal of reluctance: not that he at all doubted the power of the House to punish a witness in cases of flagrant contempt. This witness has now appeared at the bar, and declared explicitly, that in refusing to appear before the committee he did not intend to commit a contempt to the House, or to call in question its authority, and had given reasons for his refusal. Now Mr. McK. was unwilling to consume any more of the public time, to the exclusion of all the important business of the country, in an investigation of the power of the House, and in hunting up precedents to sustain that power.

It seemed to Mr. McK. he said, that the witness himself, in an alternative presented by him to the House, had opened the door to overcome any further embarrassment. He had stated several alternatives. Either that the committee should be prohibited from the use or wearing of deadly weapons: this was an alternative Mr. McK. had no disposition to consider. Another was, his offer to give his testimony, upon interrogatories, and swearing to it before a magistrate; in other words, a private examination. Now let him (Mr. McK.) ask, would not the witness's testimony, taken in this way, be just as valuable to the committee as if written in their presence? Surely it would. As the object of the committee must be, and as the object of the House in raising the committee itself, was to procure testimony bearing on the subject matters to be investigated, could they do better than by pursuing the very course indicated and tendered by this witness himself? Surely the House would not consume the balance of the session in discussing the parliamentary law on the subject of contempts, and in investigating the conduct of the members of one of its committees towards a witness brought before them. Would they consume another week upon it? which they certainly would do unless his suggestion were adopted. Suppose the witness be brought to the bar, and is heard by counsel; suppose they question the power of the House, and, in vindication of their client, go into the conduct of the various members of the select committee, what would be the certain result? It would consume the balance of the session.

He would again ask if they could now punish the witness for contempt? The dignity of the House had been vindicated; the witness had been brought to the bar, and explicitly disclaimed any intention to commit a contempt, or to be guilty of disrespect towards the House. Moreover, he declares himself ready and willing to give his testimony in the way it is obtained from many other witnesses. Mr. McK. concluded by expressing a hope that the House would consume no further time in the matter, but at once instruct the committee to take the testimony of Mr. Whitney by filing interrogatories.

Mr. HOAR could not understand the question as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. McKay) had. He had understood that gentleman as saying, that the mode of avoiding this difficulty was already pointed out by the respondent. Well, what was the course which was pointed out by the respondent? Why he had said, in the first place, that he did not intend any contempt of the House; and, in the second place, he had said, that provided the House would do certain things which he had indicated, he would be willing and ready to testify. He did not understand this as an indication of the willingness of this witness to obey the command of the Government issued by that House. Mr. H. would submit to the House this question. The witness had represented to the House that certain difficulties presented themselves to him which prevented his appearing before the committee, one of which was that he apprehended some personal danger; but could this witness not confide in the justice of the House, that it would take measures to protect him from injury while he was before one of its committees? Shall he assert, as a right, that the House, in the first place, must adopt certain measures which he had indicated before he could appear before this committee?

Mr. H. contended that no individual in the United States had this right, and that this in itself was a contempt of the Government of the United States; and, while this course was persisted in, it appeared to him that the House could not, in a proper sense of what was due to itself and to the Government, take any course other than to require the witness to obey the command of the Government. He should be as ready as any one to take every proper measure to protect a witness; because a witness there was properly under the protection of the House; and if any individual member of the House should undertake to do that which was a violation of its protection, the law furnished a remedy. Unquestionably the House was under the necessity of adopting measures to vindicate the rights of citizens; but it seemed to him that this was not the proper stage of the proceeding for the consideration of this question. It appeared to him that the only course which it was necessary for them now to pursue, to save the time of the House, was to have a committee to take testimony if testimony was necessary. Gentleman had asked why the necessity of appointing a committee to make a report when that report would have to be examined again by the House? If this objection was a proper one, it would lie against every committee which was appointed by the order of the House; your standing committees as well as your select committees. If it was proper to have committees to examine other cases, it was proper to have one to examine this case; and he could see no objection which would lie against this committee which would not lie equally against any other committee of the House.

Mr. HUNTSMAN said, Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that to adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, would be acting prematurely. Why appoint another committee upon that subject before we ascertain certainly that there may be a disputable matter for us to act upon? If I understand the nature of Mr. Whitney's plea, there are three positions assumed in it: 1st. He says that he intended no contempt to this House; That he does not believe that that summons, or process, which was issued by the chairman of the committee, was a legal process: that if the House shall determine that it was, he is willing to answer in two ways: 1st. That he will answer any interrogatories submitted, if permitted to swear to them before a justice of the peace, as in other cases of a similar character; or 2d. That he is willing to go to the committee room, provided the members thereof are restricted from wearing arms during his examination. It appears to me, sir, that, before the appointment of any committee, the House should first determine upon his first proposition, to wit: was the process legal; was he bound to answer? If the House shall thus determine (as probably it will,) that he is bound to answer. He then professes a willingness to answer in one of the two modes. If the House shall determine to accept either of the modes, then let him answer, and the question is at an end. If the House shall determine, however, that neither of these modes of answering is acceptable to the House, then there may be a necessity for the appointment of a committee to make such rules for the government of Whitney's trial as may best comport with that object. He can then be heard by counsel. But if the House shall determine that he may answer in one of the modes proposed, then much valuable time, much expense, will be saved that can be bestowed upon much more valuable subjects than any contest we can have with Reuben M. Whitney.

There is most of the appropriation bills yet to pass, seven or eight hundred bills upon your table, and not three weeks of your session yet remains. The Tennessee land bill, which has been here for twelve or fifteen years, waiting for the action of the House, and if this investigation shall take the range anticipated, it will occupy all the balance of the session, to the utter exclusion of all other business whatever.

Notwithstanding all this, I have voted for the inquiry, and all the subsequent proceedings to bring him before the bar of this House. Since this question was last up, I have examined some of the cases which have arisen in this House upon the subject of contempts. The cases seem to show that this House has never prescribed any rules for the punishment of contempts, but a simple reprimand of the culprit is the extent of its powers. There are two remarkable cases: the first of Johnson Anderson, for an attempt to bribe a member of this House. That was certainly a more flagrant offence than the refusal to appear before a committee of the House to give testimony. After several weeks' discussion and examination of Anderson's case, he was found guilty, and what then? Why, sir, he was called up before the Speaker, who, with much gravity, reprimanded him. A reprimand, then, sir, is the extent of the punishment. If this is all, (as seems to be generally understood,) the punishment you can inflict for a contempt, I conceive, is not only a prodigal waste of the time and money of the people, but it is worse: it is a farce acted before the people; it lessens the dignity of the House, to be arrayed for three weeks in a controversy with Reuben M. Whitney; at the end of which, suppose we find him guilty of every thing charged, why, all the punishment we can inflict upon him is an exquisitely nice-worded reprimand from the Speaker.

The next case of contempt was in the case of the honorable Samuel Houston. After three weeks' investigation, engrossing the time of the House, and the money of the people, to the exclusion of all other business, he was found guilty pro forma, called to the bar of the House pro forma; and the honorable Speaker, with a degree of splendor and elegance seldom equalled, pronounced a handsome eulogy (which was merited) upon the life and transactions of the honorable culprit, and ended by saying, "I am commanded by the House to reprimand you, and you are reprimanded accordingly." This was the substance of the whole—precisely like Anthony's oration over the dead body of Cæsar. After bestowing the most handsome eulogy ever delivered upon Cæsar, he says, "Yet Brutus says he (Cæsar) was ambitious; and Brutus is an honorable man." In this case, the honorable House says Mr.

Whitney has committed a contempt, and the House is composed of honorable men; and you, Mr. Whitney, are reprimanded, according to order. It is lamentable, Mr. Speaker, that this House has never passed any laws authorizing a more consummate punishment upon those who act in contempt of its authority, than a simple reprimand. Let this controversy end as it may, it amounts to nothing; or, in other words, it is worse than nothing, for so I consider a reprimand. I shall, therefore, vote to dispose of this case as early as possible, so that the House can act upon something that may be beneficial to the country, and not consume the whole session in the case of the Congress of the United States against Reuben M. Whitney, or Reuben M. Whitney against the Congress of the United States. Of Mr. Whitney I know nothing: I never saw him, to my knowledge, before he was brought to the bar of the House. But, sir, I do not wish this House to be put in such a situation, as it may lose much valuable time, expend much money, and gain nothing but a reprimand upon Reuben.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped that the time of the House might not be consumed in discussing this mere matter of form, as to whether this subject should go to a select committee or not, when the important appropriation bills to carry on the operations of the Government were yet unacted on. He did not think it was necessary to send this question to a committee, and he appealed to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) who had offered this resolution to withdraw it; because that House could just as well determine on the mode of proceeding as any seven members of it could who might be appointed a committee for this purpose. Inasmuch as Mr. Whitney was now at the bar of the House, he trusted the House would not permit this question to go to a committee; but that they would decide it there, and decide it promptly. If this was not done the wheels of government must stop, because there was no money appropriated for any one branch of the public service. He hoped that those gentlemen who had voted to bring this individual to the bar of the House, would vote to dispose of his case with all possible despatch.

Mr. MANN of New York, said it was foreseen before the committee presented this question to the deliberate consideration of the House, that it would ultimately roll itself into a question of greater magnitude for consideration and determination than any question that had been propounded there for a long time. And why so? It was because the decision of that House, and the course of its proceedings in regard to this question, involved the cause of free government, throughout the world, and the action of that House, upon a matter like the one under consideration, was to be regarded in the history of this country as for or against free government.

Sir, continued Mr. M. What spectacle are we presenting here, as the House of Representatives of the United States, to the consideration of all those nations and countries with whom we are on such terms of amity and peace, as that they take cognizance of the proceedings of this House? Are we offering to them an example for their imitation? Or are we offering to them a spectacle for their ridicule and contempt? Sir, it becomes the dignity of this House to vindicate its character as the representatives of this, the only free nation of the earth, before a tribunal of the civilized world, in regard to this matter. I care not, therefore, sir, when the national character of this country, in all future times, is to be involved, (which, upon first view, seems not to have struck the minds of all gentlemen,) I say, sir, I care not what becomes of your pitiful appropriation bills to carry on your Government. This question involves considerations of far higher import, and more imperiously calls upon the House to vindicate its character, as the guardians of civil liberty, then all the appropriation bills you could pass here from this time to the end of time!

Now, sir, why is this all so? Why, sir, you have directed one of the committees of this House to make an investigation. That committee, in the course of the investigation, have deemed it proper to take what they deemed to be exceptions to an answer given them by a witness. What was that answer? Was there anything in that answer, given by that witness, which ought to have disturbed the most fastidious member of that committee, in and of itself?

Mr. MASON of Ohio here rose and called the gentleman from New York to order, on the ground of irrelevancy.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will reduce the point to writing.

Mr. MASON understood the question before the House to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIR said it was, and pronounced the course of argument of the gentlemen from New York to be within the strict limits of that subject.

Mr. MANN resumed. Sir, I will save the gentleman the necessity of calling me to order, for I will proceed in order. I am in order. I am going on to show why the character of this House and the nation demand that this House of Representatives ought immediately to permit this examination of this witness, in regard to the alleged contempt for which he stands now arraigned at the bar of the House, under the gaze of the American people. I am going on to show, sir, why you should examine the witness forthwith, instead of raising a committee to hunt up precedents and report forms and modes of procedure.

Mr. LINCOLN begged to explain, for he thought he had been misunderstood. The object in raising the committee was merely to report a simple mode of proceeding, and very little delay would ensue, which would be amply made up by the saving of time afterwards. Mr. L. then read his amendment.

Mr. MANN. I do not misunderstand the gentleman, sir; but, in my judgment, his plan is paying more regard to shadows than to the substance. Now, is it not in the power of the gentleman himself to cross-examine the witnesses? Would he feel any reluctance to do it? If so, sir, I will do it; I can do it, too; having had a little experience since this session commenced, as well as formerly, in the cross-examination of witnesses before a committee.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts does not choose to appear here as a prosecutor in this case, and that is the reason he wants this resolution adopted. Now, I ask the gentleman not to shrink from the responsibility of coming here with a resolution, and moving the arrest of this witness. I foresaw what would be the result. I foresaw, before the committee left their room with their report, that this was to become one of the most important questions, in regard to the character of the American Congress, presented for a long time. It is to be decided here, and for the approval and approbation of the civilized world, whether a witness shall be compelled to go before a committee, whose members stand with arms in their hands to protect themselves for what that committee may deem wrong.

Sir, continued (Mr. M.) bring the person accused to your bar, and give him an opportunity of placing his vindication before this House, and in the hearing of each member of it. If there ever was an occasion, if there ever will be another occasion, for demanding, at the hands of this House, and at the expense of every moment of its time from this to the end of the session, more than the present, then I can not conceive one. I will, however, promise to relieve the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Lincoln,) from the office he seems unwilling to assume upon himself. If he does not choose to assume that responsibility of coming here in favor of that resolution, as well as myself, for I agreed to the resolution of calling the witness here, then I will assume the duties alternately, and in vindication of what I deem to be just to the character of this House, that of instituting the most scrutinizing and most careful cross-examination of these witnesses in regard to what the accused has intimated here. Let it be determined by this House—let it be determined before the eyes not only of this country, but of every civilized country of the earth, whether the proceedings of this House are to be vindicated, and asserted, and maintained; and in what manner those proceedings are to be asserted, vindicated, maintained, and carried on. Sir, it is due to the world that we should tell them that, as guardians of the rights of our own citizens, as well as maintainers of the cause of free government every where, we should point out here, from the very temple of liberty itself, what ought to be done.

In conclusion, (Mr. M.) said he would not spend one single moment in instituting an inquiry into forms of proceeding, but he was for calling upon the accused at once to enter upon his defence, give him his counsel, and let that counsel cross-examine the witnesses.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, that the question before us was what were the relative merits of the two propositions—the one made by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) and the other by the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Gholson.) He had no hesitation in saying, that unless a better plan was suggested than that which was presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi. Expedition in this matter was certainly an object. We might talk as much as we pleased about the vast importance of this subject; about its connection with the cause of free government throughout the world. For his (Mr. V's) part, he could not regard it as being of sufficient importance, to justify us in such a consumption of time with it, as to put in jeopardy the general appropriation bills.

The wheels of Government must be kept in motion. Our days here were almost numbered; and if there was not a general disposition here to despatch this matter, your appropriation bills were most assuredly in danger. Why, then, instead of proceeding immediately with the case, refer the matter back to a select committee, for the purpose of reporting to us the form of proceeding we should pursue? The Chair could appoint a committee to examine witnesses on the part of this House. The gentlemen from Mississippi would, no doubt, so modify his amendment as to authorize the Speaker to appoint such catechists or prosecutors, and then we could proceed immediately with the trial. The gentleman from Massachusetts had told us that he had looked into the precedents, and he had doubtless concocted some plan of proceeding. Let the gentleman now suggest it to us; and if he (Mr. V.) approved of it, he would probably vote for it; but he could not, and would not, contribute to the delay that would be consequent upon the passage of his resolution. Mr. Whitney had already been under arrest for two days; and it was due to him, and to the regard that we all cherished for the liberty of the citizen, that we should proceed in the matter with the least practicable delay.

Mr. LANE said, to his mind the question presented to the House is a plain one, so far as it regarded the course to be adopted in relation to the case as it now stands. The defendant has been brought to the bar of the House to answer for an alleged contempt in not giving evidence before one of its committees. To which he answers, that he intended no contempt to this House, and manifested his perfect willingness to give evidence before the committee, provided they shall appear unarmed, or that he will appear and answer interrogatories submitted before a justice of the peace.

The defendant, Mr. Whitney, stands before this House purged of all contempt; and the only remaining question is to examine witnesses for the purpose of informing the House whether the reasons alleged are or are not true, in order to enable the House, as judges in this case, to come to a correct conclusion whether the defendant ought to be protected or not.

This would be the proceeding in a court of law when brought up before the court. If he disclaimed all contempt, and gave his reasons for not obeying the process of the court, witnesses would be called upon and examined as to the truth of the excuse; if a good one, there is an end of the whole proceeding, and the accused is instantly discharged.

There can be no necessity for a committee to report rules of proceeding. Let us come at it, at once, by permitting the defendant to call witnesses to the bar of the House to prove the truth of his excuse.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) if one-half the defendant has stated to be true, in relation to what took place before committee, to his mind, the said R. M. Whitney, the defendant, would not only stand blameless before this House and the nation, but in all things justified. That he held obedience and protection go together; the one withheld, and the other ceases. That he held no one ought to be called upon to appear before a hostile and armed tribunal.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky said he had but a word or two to offer. It seemed to him that when the two propositions were gravely considered, there could be no difficulty in the minds of gentlemen as to which ought to be adopted. What were the facts? Mr. Whitney had been brought to that House upon a resolution charging him, or rather which required him to answer in regard to an alleged contempt committed by him against that House; in the first place, in failing to appear before one of its committees, when summoned for that purpose; and, in the second place, in regard to a letter written by him to the committee, which is supposed to contain an insult.

Well, he had been brought to the bar of the House, and what was then further proposed to be done? It was proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) that a committee should be appointed to inquire into the mode proper for the House to pursue in regard to the investigation of these facts. The other proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Gholson) proposed that they should proceed at once to the examination of witnesses. Now upon what subject did the gentleman propose to hear witnesses? Mr. Whitney had sent to the House a letter, which Mr. C. had not heard read, but which he understood to contain charges against members of another committee, and that he was unwilling to go before the committee which had summoned him unless the House would pass an order that the members of that committee should not be armed. He states that he is unwilling to go before that committee unless the House pass such an order, but that he is willing to go before a magistrate, and there swear his answers to such interrogatories as the committee may file. Now, suppose the last gentleman's (Mr. Gholson) proposition should be adopted, where would the inquiries extend? Would they not extend directly to the fact as to whether this committee should be armed or not? And as to whether this committee was a safe tribunal for a witness to appear before? Mr. C. would ask whether such an offer was not, of itself, an insult to the American Congress? What, was it a proper subject of inquiry, whether the Speaker of that House had constituted a committee that met armed to the teeth! Surely the gentlemen did not mean to institute such an inquiry as that!

Again, should the proposition of the gentleman be adopted, might it not happen that, instead of inquiring into the alleged contempt committed by Mr. Whitney, they would be drawn off into an investigation of the scene that took place before another committee? and that, in fact, instead of going on with the inquiry against Mr. Whitney, it would result in an inquiry into the conduct of members of that House, not in the committee before which he was summoned to appear, but before another committee? For these, and other reasons, Mr. C. was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GHOLSON would answer the gentleman by telling him what his object was in offering his resolution. He had understood this whole proceeding against Mr. Whitney to have grown out of his refusal to appear before the committee, for which refusal he (the witness) had assigned certain reasons then before the House. Now Mr. G's object was to have witnesses examined to inquire, on the part of the House, into the truth of the facts or statements set forth by Whitney to the House, and given by him as his reasons for refusing to obey the summons of the committee. If the House should think the reasons good, why, discharge him. If the House should be of opinion, however, that the reasons were insufficient, why they would not discharge him. This was the quickest, readiest, and most simple way of reaching the point. Moreover, Mr. G. was willing that the conduct of a member of that House should be inquired into as that of any other American citizen.

Mr. CALHOUN should not be disposed to go into an inquiry as to the truth or falsehood of any statement which this witness had made. He considered that it was not a proper course to go into an investigation of the conduct of members of the select committee. The proper course, he thought, would be to appoint a committee, whose duty it should be to report a mode of proceeding before the House. But if gentlemen saw proper to inquire into the conduct of members of that House—into their object in certain transactions, and into the object of the Speaker in appointing members of that House on committees, who were not proper persons for witnesses to appear before, he had no objection to it.

Mr. HARDIN would vote for the original resolution and against the amendment. He had been trying to bring himself to support the amendment, but could not do so. On last Friday, after a lengthy debate, they had directed the Speaker to issue his warrant to take that individual into custody, and bring him before the bar of the House; and Mr. H. thought that was the identical place to hear him. This witness now proposed giving his reasons why he had not appeared before the committee, and why not hear him? Gentlemen had urged upon the House the necessity of sending this subject back to a committee. Well, suppose it was sent to a committee, the witness would have to appear before that committee, and how could he appear before a committee when he was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms?

Mr. LINCOLN explained that he had merely brought this subject to the consideration of the House, and that he had no personal feelings on the matter.

Mr. MANN of New York did not mean to insinuate that the gentleman from Massachusetts had been operated upon by any sinister motives.

Mr. BELL presumed it was the intention of every gentleman to have this question put in such a situation as to despatch it as speedily as it could possibly be done, with justice to the individual who had been brought to the bar of the House, and to the House itself. The gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Gholson) proposed immediately to proceed to the examination of witnesses; but that gentleman must see that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) would not interfere with his proposition. Mr. B. wished to impress upon the House the importance in an economical point of view, of adopting the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the House could proceed with infinitely greater despatch in this way than any other. As he understood the proposition of that gentleman, the committee proposed to be raised, could at once determine on the mode of proceeding without a delay of ten minutes, and then the House would be prepared to proceed regularly with the examination of witnesses.

It would be observed, by the statement of the witness himself, that the whole difficulty had grown out of the fears he entertained of violence being committed upon him by the chairman of the committee. As soon as a committee should be instituted, and the mode of proceeding determined on, Mr. B. would propose to take a step to terminate all this difficulty, which would be to examine Mr. Whitney at the bar of the House; and, if he would state that he was really in fear of violence from the chairman of this select committee, then Mr. B. would move that the Speaker direct the Sergeant-at-arms to attend him, and protect him from violence. Mr. B. understood this to have been the reason of the witness that he would have attended before the committee but for fear of violence; and, in that case, he thought it was the duty of the House to protect a witness; and if he would state on oath that this was the reason he had failed to appear before the committee, Mr. B. would consider it the duty of the House to protect him. He hoped the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be adopted.

Mr. MANN of N. Y. then moved to amend Mr. Gholson's resolution, by adding to the end thereof the following:

"And that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to examine such witnesses on the part of the House."

Mr. GHOLSON accepted the modification.

Mr. LINCOLN'S amendment was then disagreed to.

The question then recurring on the original resolution,

Mr. BOON reminded the House that when this subject was under consideration on Friday last, he had predicted the difficulties that would arise. He was now happy to find that some gentlemen at least had changed their opinion since the vote they gave that Reuben M. Whitney should be brought there. Now, would this result, as some gentleman had intimated and designed, in that individuals being reprimanded by the Speaker? at least it had not yet become matter of record; no, nor even reduced to a certainty that it ever would be. If a law were in existence, or should be passed, defining the nature of contempts, he Mr. B. would go to arrest any individual guilty of them, be he whom he might. Till such a law should be passed, he, however, would never give his vote to bring any man before that House for contempt.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman from Illinois that the proposition then pending did not open the whole merits of the question.

Mr. BOON said he would submit one that should open the whole merits, and he sent it to the Clerk's table to be read, as follows:

Strike out after the word "Resolved," and insert "That Reuben M. Whitney now at the bar of this House be forthwith discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms."

Mr. B. hoped, he said, when the proper time arrived, the yeas and nays would be taken on this proposition. Notwithstanding the remark of the distinguished gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann,) that he considered the pitiful appropriation bills for the support of the Government, as nothing compared with the settlement of this question, Mr. B. must be allowed to say that, when the subject before the House was compared with the great general interests of the country, the case of Reuben M. Whitney and the select committee in the room below, sunk into utter insignificance. Why there was one single question, in which the western country was interested (the land bill) that was paramount to a hundred Reuben Whitney cases of this kind, nay more, he would say a thousand.

Mr. B. saw no necessity for detaining the House, at the sacrifice of all the business of the country, any further. The prisoner at the bar had told them he wished to be heard by counsel, and it was understood out of doors that he had selected two of the most distinguished gentlemen in the country as his counsel; and if they were to be heard at length, as they assuredly will if the House entered upon the subject, then this question would not be settled in six solemn days; for the counsel would occupy at least two, and each of the committee to be appointed will probably speak, and then the balance or a certain proportion of the two hundred and forty representatives would take that opportunity, also, to maintain their rights there. The truth was, he feared that the residue of the session would be consumed by it. After some further remarks, Mr. B. concluded by moving the substitute above.

Mr. ANTHONY said he had voted against the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to bring Reuben M. Whitney before the House, for an alleged contempt in refusing to appear before the committee of which an honorable member from Virginia is the chairman, and he had done so because he did not wish, at this late stage of the session, when so much important business remained to be acted on, to go into an examination of the embarrassing and difficult question of an alleged contempt of the House by refusing to appear before one of its committees; but as a majority of the House had determined to bring the accused before them, he cheerfully submitted to their decision.

Whether the accused had acted contemptuously, and how far his conduct was reprehensible, if at all, depended upon the facts which would be elicited from the examination of witnesses, and he was, therefore, opposed at present to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which directed the accused to be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, and would go for the resolution of the member from Mississippi, and ascertain satisfactorily such facts as would enable the House to judge correctly of the conduct of the accused, and to determine whether he is excusable or not in his refusal to appear before the select committee.

Mr. A. said they could not shut their eyes to what had transpired in another committee, and that the present chairman of the select committee, before which the accused refuses to appear, was one of the members of the former committee, in which a difficulty arose between a friend of the present chairman (Mr. Wise) and the accused; and on that occasion the honorable member from Virginia stated to this House that "the witness had his right hand in his pantaloons pocket; that he expected him to draw a deadly weapon on his friend; that he watched the motion of that right arm, the elbow of which could be seen by him, and, had it moved one inch, he (Whitney) had died upon the spot; that was his determination."

He would like to know from the witnesses who might be examined, all the facts in relation to this matter, so that the House might determine whether Mr. Whitney had any apprehension of being assaulted, or had any fear operating on his mind, sufficient to excuse him from appearing before the committee; he would also be able to judge from the testimony, whether there was any good and sufficient ground for apprehension of danger on the part of the witness. If he placed himself in such a situation as to be exposed "to die on the spot"—if he firmly believed his life was in danger, or if he really supposed that he subjected himself to personal injury, (Mr. A.) said he would never vote to bring him before that committee; but if, on the contrary, it was a mere idle, vague and unauthorized fear, and there was no just ground of apprehension, in such case the witness should be compelled to appear to give evidence. Our laws have respect to the intention of those who violate them, and they never punish for crime or contempt, unless there is an intentional violation. By our Post Office laws, robbery of the mail, where the life of the carrier is put in jeopardy, is punishable with death; but if the carrier's life is not put in jeopardy, the punishment is only fine and imprisonment. In the case before us, after obtaining the evidence, we shall be able to determine whether the life of Mr. Whitney was in jeopardy; or if not, whether he solemnly believes, by going before the committee, he subjects himself to personal injury.

When gentlemen talk of the indignity offered to the House, by the refusal of a witness to appear before one of its committees, and exclaim that there would be an end of all investigation, if such conduct is tolerated, they only look at one side of this disagreeable question. While he admitted that all Judicial and Legislative tribunals are bound, in honor, to assert and maintain their rights and privileges, and to enforce obedience to all their lawful mandates, yet they are equally bound by every principle of justice and equity, to protect and shield every witness that comes before them from the least personal danger from the slightest apprehension, for his safety and perfect security.

Can it be imagined for a moment that a witness would tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, when his mind is agitated with fear, and when he is under compulsion and restraint? What reliance could be placed on testimony obtained from one who considers himself in danger from those before whom he is giving evidence? It would be much better to let him go before a magistrate, and answer such interrogatories as might be propounded to him, and the testimony thus taken would have much more effect in producing conviction. Every individual has the natural right to protect himself from insult and injury. His life, his body, health and reputation are peculiarly within his own protection, and no tribunal should have the power to violate these natural indefeasible rights, and no man should be compelled to appear before any tribunal when he was placed in jeopardy of life or limb. If, on investigation, it should be found that Mr. Whitney had no reasonable ground to apprehend injury, then the House could adopt such course as would vindicate its privileges and assert its rights; but if it should turn out that he had good cause to withhold obedience to the summons of the committee, then he would vote to discharge him from custody.

In the answer of the accused to the summons of the committee, he expresses himself as perfectly willing to answer interrogatories before a magistrate, or to appear and answer before the committee, if they prevent the carrying of dangerous weapons in the committee room. This Mr. A. considered a reasonable request, from what had transpired, as the witness could as fully answer in this mode as if he were in the presence of the committee, because he believed the practice of similar committees was to put all questions in writing, and receive answers in the same manner. But if the House should decline to adopt this proposition, they could protect the witness, as their duty required them to do, by preventing dangerous weapons from entering the committee room.

In conclusion, Mr. A. observed that the House having resolved on prosecuting this subject of contempt, he was willing to hear all the facts and circumstances connected with it, and ascertain whether the accused considered himself in a state of duress, and entitled to the protection of the House, or whether it was a mere pretext on his part to avoid giving testimony before the committee. When the "truth and whole truth" should come to light, we could act as become the dignity and honor of the Representatives of a free and enlightened people.

Mr. CHAPIN moved to amend the modified resolution of Mr. GHOLSON, by adding to the end thereof the following:

"That the questions put shall be reduced to writing before they shall be proposed to the witness, and that the answers be also reduced to writing. Every question put by any other member not of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to, by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be heard after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the Speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places."

Mr. GHOLSON accepted the modification.

Mr. CHAPIN said his object in offering the amendment proposed was to save time, and prevent the confusion which must necessarily result from proceeding with the trial of the accused, without establishing some rules to govern the action of the House. This proposition accomplishes directly what the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) designed to do by raising a committee to report forthwith a mode of proceeding. We are admonished by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. Cambreleng) that the important appropriation bills are in danger of being lost by the waste of time in adhering to established forms, and that no obstacles should be thrown in the way of a prompt decision of the case before the House. This amendment embodies, substantially, the mode of proceeding recommended by the Committee of Privileges, in the celebrated case of Houston, pending before this House, in 1832. It was important to determine, preliminarily, by whom the prosecution should be conducted; in what manner the questions should be put, and the answers given; whether orally or in writing; and by whom objections to the testimony should be argued, or the whole proceeding would lead to confusion, and an interminable debate.

Mr. C. voted against the resolution requiring Mr. Whitney to be brought to the bar of this House. He did so, because the only evidence of the refusal of the witness to obey the summons of the committee, of which the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) was chairman, set forth at length the ground of such refusal, and to his mind they were perfectly satisfactory. But he would, for the present, waive the discussion on that point; as it in-involved the merits of the controversy, it would not be in order in this stage of the proceeding.

Mr. C. said, he would conclude by asking the honorable gentleman from Mississippi to accept the amendment he had offered, as a modification of the original resolution.

Mr. PARKS said that he, as well as the gentleman from Indiana, was opposed to bringing this individual before the House; but, as he was brought there, they owed it to the gentleman himself, and to the House, that he have a hearing. The motion pending was, that a committee of five be appointed to examine witnesses on the part of the House, and for the purpose of settling the question, and of ascertaining whether they would lay it aside, or go on with it, he moved the previous question.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed to Mr. P. to withdraw the motion for a moment, which he did, which Mr. G. accepted of the amendment of Mr. CHAPIN, and Mr. PARKS then renewed the motion for the previous question, which was seconded by the House—ayes 97, noes 33; and the main question having been ordered, was put and carried without a division.

So the resolution, as modified, was agreed to in the following words:

Resolved, That R. M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House in relation to his alleged contempt, and that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to examine such witnesses on the part of the House.

That the questions put shall be reduced to writing, before the same are proposed to the witness; and the answers shall also be reduced to writing. Every question put by a member, not of the committee, shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused, or his counsel, shall be heard thereon; after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the Speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places.

The CHAIR then announced his having appointed a committee to examine witnesses on the part of the House, which consisted of the following gentlemen:

Mr. GHOLSON of Mississippi.
LINCOLN of Massachusetts.
THOMAS of Maryland.
HARDIN of Kentucky.
OWENS of Georgia.

Mr. WHITNEY was then brought in, and the SPEAKER informed him that the House had come to the foregoing resolutions, and inquired of him if he was then ready?

Mr. WHITNEY said: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to go on at this time, and I respectfully ask, through you, sir, the indulgence of further time till Wednesday next. He then sent a paper to the Chair containing a list of such witnesses as he wished summoned to appear before the House for examination at the same time.

The question was divided, and the extension of time asked for by the respondent, agreed to.

The CHAIR then pronounced the other branch of the request, and named the witnesses, who were as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of Alabama.
Mr. FAIRFIELD of Maine.
Mr. GILLET of New York.
Mr. HAMER of Ohio.
Mr. LEWIS of Philadelphia, now in Washington city.
Mr. SULLIVAN of Washington.

The first four being members of the House.
Mr. CALHOON of Ky. objected to their being summoned, as contrary to usage.

The CHAIR suggested that the question be divided.
Mr. UNDERWOOD protested against the whole proceeding, and gave his reasons at some length.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution had been adopted.

Mr. HOPKINS moved the previous question on that motion; which was seconded by the House—ayes 89, noes not counted, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, being the motion to reconsider; and being ordered, the vote was taken and decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Chilton Allan, Beale, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Whitelessey, Kell, and Young—95.

So the House refused to reconsider its vote. The question then recurring on ordinary subpoenas to issue for the above named witnesses—

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky called for a division of the question.

Subpoenas for Messrs. LEWIS and SULLIVAN were then ordered without a count.

On the question directing Messrs. MARTIN, FAIRFIELD, GILLET, and HAMER, members of the House, to be summoned, the House divided, and the vote being ayes 100, noes 38, summonses were also directed to be issued for their attendance on Wednesday.

The CHAIR then inquired of the respondent if he had further request to make?

Mr. WHITNEY asked that he might be furnished with copies of the resolutions and orders.

The CHAIR propounded the question to the House, and it was agreed to.

The CHAIR then directed the Sergeant-at-arms to conduct the accused from the House, and produce him again on Wednesday next, at the hour the House met.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, the undisposed of memorials on the Speaker's table were passed over for this day, and the House agreed to proceed with the call for petitions and memorials from States and Territories, commencing with the latter.

Mr. PEACE of Rhode Island.

[Mr. PEACE of Rhode Island presented certain resolutions recently adopted by the Legislature of that State, instructing the Hon. Nehemiah R. Knight and the Hon. Asher Robbins, to vote to exonerate from the journals of the Senate their resolution of 28th March, 1834.

Also to vote for Richard M. Johnson for Vice President of the United States, in accordance with the voice of a majority of the people of that State, manifested in their election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. P. said those resolutions had come to him rather late, but better late than never; it was never too late to do good.

He would not however have found it necessary to present these resolutions, if they had have been presented in the other end of the Capitol.]

Mr. PINCKNEY said, he had been requested by a number of individuals interested in certain prizes made by the late celebrated John Paul Jones, to endeavor to obtain for them the compensation to which they were respectively entitled for their services. In relation to this matter he had applied for information to the Treasury Department, and had obtained therefrom a statement respecting the prizes sent into France, which on his motion had been ordered to be printed for the use of the House. It appeared from that statement that the sum of twenty thousand dollars had been received on account of the capture of the Serapis, the Countess of Scarborough, and Bonhomme Richard, of which by far the greater portion had been paid away, leaving only a small balance of three or four thousand dollars to be divided amongst such of the captors of those vessels as may still survive. But there was another class of captives: he alluded to those that were sent into Bergen, in Norway, and which were there delivered up to the English by the Crown of Denmark. It appeared to him that if ever a reclamation was to be made on Denmark for the value of those prizes, it was high time that a negotiation should be opened. He therefore asked leave to offer a joint resolution on the subject.

Leave being granted, Mr. P. then sent to the Chair the following resolution:

A joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to assert and prosecute with effect the claim of the United States against Denmark for the value of the three prizes made by John Paul Jones in 1779, and which were sent by him into Bergen in Norway, and there delivered up to the English by the Crown of Denmark.

Mr. HOWARD moved that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He was under the impression that it was embraced under the last treaty between the United States and Denmark.

Mr. PINCKNEY had no objection to the reference, but was perfectly satisfied that those prizes had never been made the subject of any treaty stipulation with Denmark. The resolution submitted the propriety of action to the judgment of the President, and he hoped the committee would soon report it.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina presented the petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the recognition of the independence of Texas; which he moved to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it the order of the day for next Tuesday week.

Mr. HOWARD moved to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

This petition, giving rise to debate, was laid over.

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, presented a similar memorial from citizens of the District; and moved its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS then inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs at what time they might expect a report from that committee on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Texas.

Mr. ROBERTSON inquired if a question of this kind was in order.

The CHAIR replied that by the courtesy of the House, inquiries of this kind were permitted.

Mr. HOWARD then reminded the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. LEWIS) that about a month ago the Committee on Foreign Affairs had directed him to introduce a resolution calling on the President of the United States for information in regard to our intercourse with Mexico, as they considered it to have a direct bearing upon the subject of our affairs with Texas; and they considered the information they were to obtain by that resolution as most material in making up an opinion in relation to the recognition of the independence of Texas.

But when the document called for came before the House, it would be recollected that he (Mr. Howard) had moved to commit it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; when a motion was made to accompany that reference with instructions, and in consequence of this, the Committee on Foreign Affairs had never, up to this moment, had it in their power to get at the information contained in the document, it being still tied up in House. The gentleman from Alabama, must therefore perceive, that as the committee had not yet had access to these papers, it could do nothing until this question of reference was settled.

Mr. ROBERTSON then asked leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, all correspondence and communications (if any) which have passed between the Executive of the United States and Santa Anna, during his recent visit to Washington, or since his capture by the Texan army, not heretofore communicated; in what character, whether as the recognized representative of the Mexican Government, or otherwise, such correspondence or communications have been carried on with him, also whether either of the vessels equipped, or destined for the exploring expedition to the Pacific Ocean and South Seas, or any other public vessel, has been put in requisition, for his conveyance to Mexico or elsewhere, and if so, the reasons which in the opinion of the President, rendered such requisition necessary or proper, with all orders relative thereto, also, all communications and correspondence, if any, between the Executive of the United States and Gen. Samuel Houston, or other persons claiming to exercise the powers of government in Texas, relating to the civil war now or recently prevalent therein, or relating to any proposed interference or negotiation on the part of the United States, on behalf of Texas.

Mr. OWENS objecting.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a suspension of the rules for this purpose, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 65, nays 37.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BEAUMONT submitted the following resolution:

M. the House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the following bills, viz: No. 353, entitled a bill to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution," approved 7th June, 1834; and a bill granting an additional quantity of land to satisfy Virginia military land warrants.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. Mr. PATTON in the Chair, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the annual appropriation bills—that for the naval service being pending.

ARMY BILL.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the committee would, before proceeding to the navy bill, take up the bill making appropriations for the support of the army, and concur in the amendments of the Senate to that bill, the principal amendment being for the pay of the Tennessee volunteers. He moved that this bill be taken up; which was accordingly done.

After some remarks by Messrs. CARTER and WHITTLESEY,

Mr. GRAVES moved an amendment to the bill appropriating $75,000 for the payment of the expenses of the Kentucky volunteers, who were called out under the orders of General Gaines, and received into the service of the United States, but were immediately discharged.

Mr. GRAVES advocated his amendment at some length, and pointed out the obvious injustice there would be in drawing any line of distinction between men having equal claims upon the gratitude or consideration of the country; and pointed out the identity between the Tennessee and Kentucky volunteers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee said, he regretted that the gentleman from Kentucky had thought it necessary to throw any impediment in the way of the passage of this bill. The volunteers provided for in this bill had been mustered by an officer of the United States, and received into the public service, and the muster rolls returned to the War Department, and as such were entitled to their pay as much as the regular soldiers in the army of the United States. It was not averse to the payment of the volunteers from Kentucky—very far from it; they should be paid, and will be paid; but he apprehended that the distinction taken by the chairman of the Committee of Claims between the class of cases provided for in this bill, and the class proposed to be provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, merited the attention of the committee. The latter class had not been received and mustered into the service of the United States by an officer of the United States, nor had a muster roll been returned. If provision for their payment is now to be made, it must be a gross sum, leaving it to the judgment of the paying officers to decide who were entitled, and who were not entitled. In the former case, the troops were mustered and organized under the laws of the United States, and would be paid as such. In the latter case, they were organized, he presumed, under the laws of Kentucky, which might be altogether different from that required by the laws of the United States. Before any appropriation could be, therefore, properly made, he apprehended the rolls of the several companies should be examined at the War Department, and estimates furnished by that department. These volunteers ought, as he had before said, to be paid, and no doubt would be. But can we do it now safely? The Kentucky volunteers are left upon the same footing with the Tennessee volunteers, similarly situated, to be provided for hereafter, when proper information should be received at the department; and he understood there was perhaps as large a number not received into the service of the United States, as those who had been actually received into the service. Mr. J. expressed a hope that the present bill might be permitted to pass. None doubted the correctness of paying those provided for in this bill, and he did not think they ought to be delayed for the want of proper information in relation to the other class, no doubt equally as meritorious as those provided for in this bill; and when information shall be received which will enable us to act understandingly upon the subject, he would cheerfully give his support also to that class.

After some further remarks by Messrs. E. WHITTLESEY CHAMBERS of Kentucky, and CARTER,

Mr. CARTER moved an amendment to the amendment providing that those volunteers of Tennessee who were called out and mustered at Athens, should be indemnified by paying them three months' pay.

After some remarks from Messrs. FRENCH, CAMBRELENG, WHITTLESEY, and GRAVES,

Mr. CLARKBORNE of Miss. moved the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. GRAVES: "And that a like sum of seventy-five thousand dollars be appropriated for the payment of the Mississippi volunteers."

Mr. C. said that at a very early period of the session, a gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Shields,) had offered a resolution, providing for the payment of the Tennessee volunteers. He (Mr. C.) had moved a modification of the resolution, so as to include those citizens of Mississippi who had volunteered under the requisition of Gen. Gaines. The resolution, so amended, went to a committee; and here is a bill providing for the payment of the one, to the utter exclusion of the other. It was a distinction which he did not understand. It wore the appearance of an indignity, and would be so construed by his constituents. He wished to know why this discrimination had been made upon what grounds?

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. C. when that requisition was made, from eight hundred to a thousand young men flew to the standard of your country. They were citizens of the first respectability, but most of them without fortune; many of them pawned all that they had of earthly property, to equip themselves for service; others were supplied by the liberality of their fellow citizens; my colleague himself, sir, raised upon his own credit upwards of three thousand dollars, and marched at the head of a gallant troop, who paused for an opportunity to imitate the deeds of their fathers on the field of battle. Other hands, offered by young and valiant spirits, went from Winston, Naxueh, Yellobusha, Lawndes and other counties, and they marched under banners consecrated by the hand of women, and blessed with the benedictions of the lovely and the gifted. They were received into service; they made enormous personal and pecuniary sacrifices to obey your call; they would have harvested as much honor in the conflict, if it had come, as the volunteers of any other State; they were disappointed against their own consent, and to their universal disappointment; and I now demand for them the same compensation which is provided for others by this bill. I demand it, sir, as an act of justice, not as a charity. We scorn your charity; we scorn all your bribes, whether they come in the shape of appropriations or benefactions; but I demand payment to those patriotic volunteers, for the expenses and privations they incurred.

Sir, said Mr. Calhoun, I am interposing no obstacle to the passage of this bill. I will vote for it in any form. If any State in this confederacy has strong claims upon the consideration of the country, it is the State of Tennessee. Her achievements on the battle field have furnished our national banner with imperishable renown. History can never forget them. She has produced, too, a statesman, who, after having rendered the most pre-eminent services to the cause of constitutional liberty, is about to retire from his exalted station with more of the admiration of the world, with more of the confidence and affection of the people, with more of those qualities that secure an undying fame than any one now living—a name, sir, that stands now, and for a longer centuries will stand, a beacon for the soldiers of freedom, wherever human rights are violated, or man oppressed.

"A light, a landmark on the cliffs of fame."

Sir, (continued Mr. C.) I appeal from the committee who reported this bill to the House for justice. I appeal, in the names of the volunteers of Mississippi and of Kentucky, whose claims have just been settled and eloquently advocated by my friends from that State, (Messrs. French, Chambers, and Underwood.) I appeal to the Tennessee Representatives themselves, who are ready on every occasion to vindicate with distinguished ability, the rights and honor of their constituents. Under existing circumstances, this appropriation may not be made for the volunteers of Kentucky and Mississippi. He did not know whether he should ever again be honored with a place in this House; he might soon himself become an example of the evanescent and fleeting nature of popularity; but he gave notice to the committee, that whether he was here to assert the rights of his constituents, or whether they should send a more eloquent advocate, this claim would be pressed, would be insisted upon, until justice should be rendered.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio explained, in reply to Mr. CLARKBORNE, that the committee had applied to the War Department, and had received for answer that no returns or muster rolls had been transmitted to the Department by the proper officers in Mississippi; and until those returns were made, the committee could not act in the case of the Mississippi volunteers. They had no data at all to act upon. The fault was not with the committee, but with the State authorities.

After some further remarks by Messrs. ALFORD, BELL, CAMBRELENG, WHITTLESEY, CHILTON ALLEN, and LAWLER,

Mr. GRAVES modified his amendment, so as to make an appropriation for all volunteers who had turned out and been accepted by the Governors of the different States, under the call for volunteers by Gen. Gaines.

On Mr. GRAVES's amendment to the Senate's amendment to the army bill, Mr. DUNLAP said:

Mr. Chairman: The Senate's amendment only appropriates money that is due to the volunteers of Tennessee, who were mustered into service and immediately discharged. The act of 1836 provides that all those volunteers who entered the service of the United States should be paid for six months' clothing, and that sum is due them immediately on their entering into the service. This amendment only appropriates the amount due those volunteers. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky provides for only one other class of volunteers, to wit: those who were received by the Governors of Kentucky and Mississippi, but were not mustered into service by an officer of the United States. There is, sir, another class of volunteers equally meritorious. I mean, sir, those who marched to the place of rendezvous under the proclamation of the Governors of the different States, and were not received either by the United States officer or the Governor. This latter class of volunteers marched from the portion of Tennessee I reside in, to Fayetteville, they paid their own expenses, had to furnish themselves with rations while at the place of rendezvous, as the Governor did not furnish rations to any but those received into the service.

Now sir, I cannot see that there is any difference between paying those who were received into the service and immediately discharged, and those who tendered those services at the place of rendezvous; all were clothed and equipt for a six or twelve months' campaign; one class are provided for who receive pay for six months' clothing, while those who paid their own expenses receive nothing.

Mr. Chairman, it will be a very difficult thing to satisfy those gallant volunteers that there is any difference in their claims on this Government; gentlemen may draw their distinctions here, but they will be considered elsewhere distinctions without a difference. I know, sir, that many men from my district, who volunteered their services, went to the expense of purchasing horses to ride the campaign, and when they returned home, were glad to sell, by losing from thirty to fifty dollars in the price of the horse.

I have drawn up an amendment to the gentleman's amendment, which I ask him to receive as a modification to his amendment. It provides for the payment of all those who offered their services to the United States in any of the States, under the proclamations of the respective Governors of the States, the same pay as those who were mustered into service and immediately discharged. This, sir, will be some compensation, though not as much as will indemnify them for the loss they sustained; it places all the volunteers on an equality.

After some further remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, GLASCOCK, DAWSON, HAYNES, DUNLAP, GRENELL, HOLSEY, and MERCER,

Mr. CARTER withdrew his amendment.

Mr. LAWLER moved to amend the amendment of Mr. GRAVES, by including the volunteers of Alabama, mustered at Mount Vernon, in that State.

Mr. GRAVES then modified his amendment by inserting the sum of $100,000, which he thought would cover all the amount necessary.

Before taking the question, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the bill was laid aside, and the committee resumed the consideration of the NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

Being the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. Jarvis to reduce the item for the pay, of the officers and seamen of the navy $150,000.

Mr. J. modified his amendment, by reducing the amount $51,113, as that was the difference between the cost of sending and not sending a frigate.

Mr. J. also made a further modification of his amendment, by adding a proviso to the clause, that nothing contained in this, or any other appropriation should be considered as authorizing or approving any increase in the Surveying or Exploring Expedition, authorized by the act of June, 1836.

Mr. JARVIS addressed the House at some length, going into a variety of statements, to show the entire impracticability of sending out a frigate on this expedition. All the documents referred to, went to show that vessels not exceeding two hundred tons, were best calculated to carry through this important expedition.

Mr. CAMBRELENG implored of gentlemen not to enter into a lengthy discussion of the mere matter, as to whether a frigate was or was not to be sent on this expedition, because it might be possible, though he did not apprehend it himself, that in a few weeks this frigate would be wanting in the Gulf of Mexico.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island the committee rose and reported.

The Speaker having resumed the Chair,

Mr. VAN DERPOEL moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were, yeas 33 nays 68.

So a majority of those present refused to adjourn; and there being no quorum.

Mr. CAMBRELENG renewed the motion, and

The House adjourned.

ERRATUM.—The resolution published in yesterday's paper in relation to a survey of the valley of the Susquehanna river, was erroneously attributed to Mr. RUSSELL. It was introduced by Mr. LEONARD.

[The following was unavoidably crowded out yesterday.]
[Mr. CARR of Ia. presented the following petition, signed by citizens of the State of Indiana; which, upon his motion, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals:

The honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The undersigned, your petitioners, citizens of the State of Indiana, would beg leave respectfully to represent to your honorable body, that the falls of the river Ohio still present a serious obstacle to its navigation, notwithstanding the Louisville and Portland canal has been constructed ostensibly with a view to an amelioration of that impediment; that the great and increasing commerce of the vast valley of the Mississippi imperiously demands the removal of every obstruction to the free and rapid transit of the products of western industry to their proper markets; that the many States interested in the navigation of the Ohio river, places this matter upon a footing with any work in the Union, in point of national importance. Your honorable body has already assented to this principle in the liberal appropriations which have been made to the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, as well as the subscription of stock to the Louisville and Portland canal. The object for which the Louisville and Portland canal has been constructed, has not been attained to the extent contemplated; the reasons for this failure, your petitioners will briefly state:

1st. The canal is too narrow and too shallow to accommodate boats of heavy tonnage.

2d. The site of the land being peculiarly favorable to a constant precipitation of mud, and the lodgement of drift wood, makes it necessary for the company occasionally to suspend business until those obstructions can be removed, which is a vexatious cause of delay to boats, while it restores the old custom of land transportation from Louisville to Portland.

3d. In consequence of the heavy expenditures necessary to keep the canal navigable, the company is compelled, in order to realize fair dividends, to exact exorbitant tolls, which constitute an immense burden upon the people of the West.

Under these circumstances, your petitioners would respectfully represent the duty and propriety of constructing by Government appropriations, a free canal on the Indiana side of said river, or upon such other plan as your wisdom may deem proper; your petitioners are confident that such a work could be completed for a less sum than would be requisite to purchase the stock in the Louisville and Portland canal, while at the same time it would be much better calculated to subserve the wants of the western people. Your honorable body would be satisfied of the truth of this statement, were the estimates of the cost of the work laid before you by competent engineers. As a data from which a conclusion can be drawn, your petitioners have herewith transmitted to you a report of an engineer of acknowledged abilities made to the old canal company in 1819. The superior advantages which this work offers, ought to induce the General Government to undertake its construction. To make the Louisville and Portland canal of sufficient width and depth to admit the transit of boats of the largest size, would require an additional expenditure of perhaps $500,000. This sum added to the amount required to extinguish the individual stock in said work, would be more than double the sum necessary to construct the Jeffersonville Ohio canal. Your petitioners would therefore ask your honorable body to direct a portion of the resources of the General Government to the accomplishment of the proposed work. The State of Indiana will no doubt consent to the project, and perhaps lend a helping hand to complete it. The interests of the western States demand every facility than can be afforded to the free navigation of their great arteries of trade. Your petitioners would, therefore, cherish the hope that your honorable body will bestow upon this subject the consideration its importance deserves, and that you will without delay enter upon the work with a spirit commensurate with its magnitude; and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.]

[HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF U. S.]
February 13, 1837.

To the Editors of the Globe:

Sirs: In the report, published in this morning's Globe, of the debate in the House of Representatives, on the resolution directing the Speaker to issue his warrant for the arrest of R. M. Whitney, my name is inserted in the list of yeas and nays, as voting upon the motion to lay that resolution on the table.

The journal of the House will show that, on that question, I did not vote at all. I was excused from voting on that and every other question affecting the personal rights of Reuben M. Whitney, for reasons expressly assigned by me, conformably to the rule of the House.

I take this occasion to remark that, in the report of the debate, on the same day, upon the resolution offered by Mr. Taylor, there are considerable errors in the statement of what was said by me. I did not say that I believed the paper, purporting to be a petition from slaves, to be a forgery, designed as a hoax upon me; nor did I say that I should not again attempt to present the petition. What I said was, that I now believed the paper to be a forgery by a slaveholding master, for the purpose of daring me to present a petition purporting to be from slaves. That having thus reason to believe it a forgery, I should not present it as a petition, whatever might be the decision of the House on the question before them. If I should present it at all, it would be to invoke the authority of the House to cause the author of the forgery to be prosecuted for the forgery; which I certainly would do, if there were a competent judicial authority to try the offender, and I could require and obtain evidence to prove the fact.

I am not in the habit of considering a forgery, committed to deter a member of Congress from the discharge of his duty, as a hoax.

I am, with due respect, sirs, your obedient servant,
J. Q. ADAMS.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he hereby is, authorized to inquire into the utility of establishing a line of telegraphs from Washington to the city of New York; and to report to Congress, at its next session, the facilities and advantages of that plan of communication; the probable expense of erecting and maintaining such line of telegraphs; the regulations which may be necessary and proper for the management of the same, and an estimate of the probable income to be derived therefrom from the transmission of private intelligence.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States;

The bill in addition to the act to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, passed on the 4th of July, 1836;

The bill to establish a foundry and armory in the West or South West, arsenals in the States in which none have been established, and depots for arms in certain States and Territories;

The bill respecting discriminating duties on Dutch and Belgian vessels and their cargoes; and

The bill to alter and amend the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States. This last act was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Clay, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dana, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Page, Preston, Robbins, Rugles, Sevier, Strange, Talmadge, Tipton, White, and Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Hendricks, Kent, McKean, Moore, Niles, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Walker, Wall, and Webster—17.

The Senate then took up as the unfinished business, the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The question being on concurring with the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

On taking the questions as to agreeing to the amendments reducing the appropriations, they were severally disagreed to; and on motion of Mr. CLAY, they were amended, so as to reduce the appropriation for Ohio, from $290,000 to $190,000; for Indiana from $250,000 to $150,000; and for Illinois from $150,000 to $100,000.

The question came up on the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, striking out the proviso that the appropriations shall be replaced out of the two per cent. fund, reserved for making roads leading to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois,—a debate arose, in which Messrs. WALKER, HENDRICKS, SEVIER, CLAY, PRESTON, HUBBARD, and NILES, participated, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CLAY offered an amendment providing, that in all cases, where it can be done, the work shall be laid out in sections, and it shall be the duty of the superintending officers to let it to the lowest bidder; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER moved an additional section, "that this act shall not be regarded as pledging the faith of the Government of the United States to any further or additional appropriations for the Cumberland road."

After some remarks from Messrs. LINN, WALKER, and TIPTON, this amendment was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, and White—17.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—yeas 25, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Page, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Talmadge, Tipton, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, Clayton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Moore, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Strange, Walker, Wall, and White—18.

The bill making payment to the volunteers and militia of Kentucky and Tennessee called into the service of the United States, by the Governors of the respective States, and discharged before marching, was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Messrs. BENTON and WHITE explained the objects of the bill; after which,

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the militia called into service from Alabama were included, as were those from Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, and after other amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 15, 1837.

Mr. HOWARD said, that it was within the knowledge of the House that a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Jackson,) who was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, had been detained from the House for the greater part of the present session, in consequence of severe indisposition, and the necessity he was under of removing from the city of Washington in order to obtain professional advice. Mr. H. had just received a letter from that gentleman, in which he stated that there was no prospect of his regaining his health sufficiently to be able to give his attendance at the House during the remainder of the session. As it was very desirable that the Committee on Foreign Affairs should be full, Mr. H. therefore made the usual motion, that Mr. Jackson of Georgia be excused from further attendance on that committee, and that the Speaker be required to fill up the vacancy: which was agreed to.

R. M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

Mr. WHITNEY having been placed at the bar, and stated his readiness to proceed at once to trial,

Mr. BRIGGS then submitted the following proposition:

Whereas, by the 11th rule of this House, all acts, addresses, and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the Speaker, and all writs, warrants, and subpoenas, issued by the order of the House, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk:

And whereas the subpoena by virtue of which R. M. Whitney, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms of the House, by order of the House, for an alleged contempt for refusing to appear and give testimony before one of the select committees of the House, was not under the hand and seal of the Speaker, and attested by the Clerk, but signed by the chairman of the select committee: therefore,

Resolved, That the refusal of R. M. Whitney to appear and testify before said committee, was not a contempt of this House.

Resolved, That the said Whitney be forthwith discharged from the custody of this House.

Mr. E. insisted that this preliminary question

House was about to adopt it, they would be under the necessity of seeing what the paper was, and to that he would willingly submit. He would be willing the petition should be received and considered, and he would be willing for almost any thing except to grant the prayer of this petition, because the gentleman from Alabama might find that its prayer was precisely what he had been so strenuously contending for. Mr. A. then went on to reply to some remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Granger,) after which, he made a defence of his conduct, in presenting the petition of certain persons from Fredericksburg. He contended that the character of the petitioners should not be made the grounds for rejecting petitions, if they were couched in respectful language. All petitions he contended should be received whether they come from the highest or wealthiest individuals in the land, or whether they come from the poorest or lowest in character. The Sultan of a despotic Government was bound to receive the petitions of the vilest of his subjects, and he hoped that no distinction would be made in petitions in a free Government, so long as they were in respectful language.

The debate was further continued by Mr. MANN of New York, and Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, when the latter gentleman submitted the following modification:

Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, by an effort to present a petition from slaves, has committed a gross contempt of this House.

Resolved, That the member from Massachusetts, above named, by creating the impression, and leaving the House under such impression; that said petition was for the abolition of slavery when he knew it was not, has trifled with the House.

Resolved, That the Hon. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS receive the censure of the House for his conduct referred to in the preceding resolutions.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. PICKENS, CAMBRELENG, LEWIS, GLASCOCK, PINCKNEY, LAWLER, WISE, and JENIFER; and on motion of the last gentleman,

The House adjourned.

A message was received from the President of the United States by ANDREW JACKSON, Jr. Esq. his private secretary, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

At the beginning of this session, Congress was informed that our claims upon Mexico had not been adjusted, but that, notwithstanding the irritating effect upon her councils of the movements in Texas, I hoped, by great forbearance, to avoid the necessity of again bringing the subject of them to your notice. That hope has been disappointed. Having in vain urged upon that Government the justice of those claims, and my indispensable obligation to insist that there should be "no further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress of the injuries complained of," my duty requires that the whole subject should be presented, as it now is, for the action of Congress, whose exclusive right it is to decide on the further measures of redress to be employed. The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late Extraordinary Mexican Minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past, before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given, with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals, and the use of the naval force of the United States by the Executive against Mexico, to enforce them, in the event of a refusal by the Mexican Government to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us, upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico.

The documents herewith transmitted, with those accompanying my message in answer to a call of the House of Representatives of the 17th ultimo, will enable Congress to judge of the propriety of the course heretofore pursued, and to decide upon the necessity of that now recommended.

If these views should fail to meet the concurrence of Congress, and that body be able to find in the condition of the affairs between the two countries, as disclosed by the accompanying documents, with those referred to, any well-grounded reasons to hope than an adjustment of the controversy between them can be effected without a resort to the measures I have felt it my duty to recommend, they may be assured of my co-operation in any other course that shall be deemed honorable and proper.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Washington, Feb. 6, 1837.

The message having been read, it was, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying documents, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KENT presented the memorial of Elizabeth Scott; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD presented certain resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Delaware, condemnatory of the Expunging resolutions, which have been adopted and acted on by the Senate, and instructing their Senators to use their exertions to get the same rescinded.

Mr. B. remarked that the object of the joint resolutions he had presented, was to have the expunging resolutions, passed the 16th of January last, rescinded, and that the journal of the Senate should be restored to the state in which it was before their passage. He was aware that it would be unparliamentary, at the present session, to move in the matter, because it was the sense of the body now that the resolutions should be undisturbed; but, in compliance with the wishes of the Legislature of Delaware, he would take the liberty of stating that, at the next session, and every succeeding session that he might retain a seat in this Senate, he would use his earnest efforts to accomplish the object they had in view. He trusted that the day was not far distant when Senators, entertaining the opinions he did, would be able to restore the journal to its former condition, and to rescind the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BROWN observed that he had no doubt the gentleman would persevere, in order to attain the object of his wishes. He (Mr. B.) would vote for the printing of the joint resolutions. But, at the same time, he would mention a fact, and that was, that when an honorable Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr.

Hubbard,) presented from his State certain instructions, though of an opposite character to those before the Senate, the courtesy of printing was not extended to his State. Mr. B. thought, however, that it was but extending a proper courtesy to every State, to order their resolutions to be printed, as was almost invariably done.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Hannah Mendenhall Baldwin, widow of Doctor Baldwin, late a surgeon of the navy, praying for a pension: referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRIS presented two memorials and joint resolutions, one on the subject of lands granted to Ohio for canal purposes, and sold by the Governor, and the other on the subject of the lands ceded by the Wyandot Indians for the purpose of making a road: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. MORRIS presented two petitions from sundry citizens of Ohio, one signed by males the other by females, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; one of which being read,

Mr. WALKER objected to their reception.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the ques ion, as to the reception of the petitions, be laid on the table.

Mr. MORRIS called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion was carried in the affirmative: yeas 27, nays 11; by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clayton, Dana, Ewing of Ill. Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Kent, King of Ala. King of Ga. Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Preston, Robinson, Ruggies, Strange, Walker, White, Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Ewing of O. Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Robbins, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson—11.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the petition of Reuben James; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PARKER presented the petition of the Alexandria and Falmouth Railroad company, praying for the aid of Congress in the construction of the work: referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the subject had been referred by a resolution of the Senate, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas A. Smith, Receiver of Public Moneys at Franklin, Missouri; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. LINN,

The Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Barclay.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to provide for the completion of the title of the United States to the site of the light-house on Ranoake marshes; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. BROWN,

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of the heirs of Henry Conner and the heirs of George Cook.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD,

The Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John McDonald and Wm. D. Cheever; and the Committee on Revolutionary Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Everard Chapman.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, reported without amendment, the bill from the House for the relief of David Kilburn.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which had been referred the petition of Samuel Raul, asking the patronage of Congress for his invention, to prevent the bursting of steam boilers, and the resolution of the Senate on the same subject, made a special report thereon; which was read, and 2,000 extra copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. EWING of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of John H. McIntosh, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. EWING, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Daniel Bradley.

Mr. NILES, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred various petitions from mail contractors, praying for additional allowances, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to fix the salaries of the Surveyor General of Arkansas, and of the draftsmen and clerks employed in his office; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. Franklin, their clerk, stating that the House had concurred in the resolutions reported by the joint committee as to the mode of examining and counting the votes for President and Vice President, and that the House had appointed the honorable Mr. Thomas and the honorable Mr. Ingersoll tellers on their part.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported without amendment the bill from the House amending the act of the last session, establishing branches of the mint, which was taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole, read a second time, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the same committee, reported, with an amendment, the bill from the House making appropriations for the support of the army; which was read a second time and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the petition of John Hewson, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Thaddeus Fairbank; which was read twice, and referred.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill to restore to certain invalid pensioners the pensions by them relinquished; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The following resolutions were submitted, considered, and adopted:

By Mr. EWING of Illinois:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the relinquishment of the reversionary interest of the United States in all Indian reservations made at the treaty of Camp Tippecanoe, in October, 1832, between the Government of the United States and the Pottawatamie, Otto, and Chippewa Indians.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

Clark, Crana, Dawson, Deberry, Deany, Dromgoole, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howell, Lawrence, Lay, Love, Lyon, Maury, Mercer, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Reed, Robertson, Russell, Steele, and Underwood—35.

So the House laid it on the table.

Mr. HARDIN said, as he had found himself appointed on the committee to examine witnesses in this case, he had looked into some of the precedents in such cases, and it appeared to him that the individual who had been brought to the bar of the House, should be first sworn to answer such questions as might be propounded to him, touching his reasons for not appearing before the select committee, after being duly summoned so to appear.

Mr. H. said he had prepared a couple of interrogatories which he wished to propound to the individual who had been brought to the bar of the House. The first interrogatory he desired to propound to the witness was as follows:

"Are you unwilling to appear before the select committee of this House of which the Hon. Henry A. Wise is chairman?"

If this interrogatory was answered in the affirmative, he then desired to put to him the following:

"Do you believe the select committee, or any member thereof, will do you personal violence, during your attendance before the committee, or in your coming thereto or returning therefrom?"

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired if the interrogatories had been settled upon by the committee as proper ones to be propounded?

Mr. HARDIN replied, that the committee had not. As he understood the rule adopted by the House, the committee, or any member of it, might propound interrogatories.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he must object to this course of proceeding.

The CHAIR said the rule adopted the other day granted to the accused the privilege of first examining witnesses touching his alleged contempt of the House.

Mr. HARDIN moved that Mr. Whitney be now sworn, for the purpose of answering such interrogatories as might be propounded to him. Mr. H. said he made this motion for the purpose of avoiding a very unpleasant—

Mr. VANDERPOEL called the gentleman to order. By the order of the House the accused was granted leave to proceed and take testimony touching his alleged contempt of the House. He would therefore submit to the Chair whether the gentleman from Kentucky was in order.

The CHAIR read the order of the House, as follows:

"Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House in relation to his alleged contempt; and that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to examine such witnesses on the part of the House. That the questions put shall be reduced to writing before proposed to the witnesses, and that the answers be also reduced to writing. Every question put by any other than a member of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to, by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be heard, after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the Speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places."

The order of the House was peremptory that "Reuben M. Whitney be NOW permitted to examine witnesses." He therefore felt constrained to decide against the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the House then proceed to carry into effect its order of a former day, which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then addressed the respondent, and informed him that, by an order of the House, he was then permitted to examine witnesses before the House, in relation to the alleged contempt against him, and that he could then proceed to do so. The Speaker further informed him that the witnesses he had named had been summoned.

Mr. KEY, one of the counsel of the accused, asked that the witnesses be now sworn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND objected to the swearing of Mr. Lewis and Mr. Sullivan at that time, because he understood they would be brought forward to testify as to the character of the accused, and that question had not yet come up.

The witnesses who were members of the House, as before stated, were then sworn, and the swearing of the other gentlemen deferred for the present.

The Hon. Mr. FAIRFIELD of Maine was then called, and the following question propounded to him by Mr. KEY:

Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee, whereof Mr. GARLAND is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and PEYTON, as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Mr. CALHOUN of Kentucky took an exception to this question, and, after an argument of some length by that gentleman, and a reply by Mr. KEY, of counsel for the accused, (both of which will be given as soon as they can be prepared,) and the decision of a point of order, raised by Mr. BELL, the House decided that the interrogatory should be propounded to the witness—yeas 132, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Ash, Barton, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, George Chambers, Chaney, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Denny, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Eifer, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, John Galbraith, Gholson, Gillet, Glascock, Graham, Grant-Haley, Joseph Hall, Hardin, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holsely, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, Ingham, James, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, C. Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKay, McKee, McKim, McLene, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, Pinckney, Potts, Rencher, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Ripley, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Sprangler, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, John Thompson, Toucey, Turner, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Ward-Webster, Weeks, White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, and Yell—132.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bond, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Crane, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Dunlap, Elmore, Forester, Rice Garland, Griffin, Harlan, Harper, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howell, Ingersoll, Lawler, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Sampson Mason, Maury, McCarty, McComas, Mercer, Milligan, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Pickens, Reed, Russell, Shields, Sloane, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Underwood, and Lewis Williams—50.

Messrs. PEYTON, GARLAND of Virginia, FAIRFIELD, JOHNSON of Louisiana, HAMER, PIERCE of New Hampshire, HANNEGAN, and MARTIN, were severally, on their own motions, excused from voting on any subject affecting this inquiry.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky then sent to the Chair the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further examination of witnesses be suspended, until the accused be examined on oath, touching his alleged contempt of this House, and that the committee appointed to examine witnesses proceed to examine him accordingly.

The CHAIR decided that this resolution was not in order at this time; and read the order of the House in support of his decision.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky appealed from this decision.

The CHAIR suggested that the gentleman might obtain his object by moving to suspend the rules of the House.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had no desire to move to suspend the rules of the House, but he wished to suspend the present mode of proceeding. By the decision of the Chair, he contended that the House had lost the command of its own action on this subject; and he was not willing to submit to a decision of that kind. They were to be sure examining witnesses by an order of the House, but he contended they could suspend that course of proceeding by a majority of the House, and the resolution he had submitted, presented the question as to whether the House would examine the accused on oath or not. He was aware that he was to be told that they had adopted for their government a rule that they would examine witnesses on the part of the accused, touching his alleged contempt; but he had not understood, and he thought there were but few of the intelligent members of the House who had understood, that by adopting this rule, declaring they would hear evidence on the part of the accused, they had deprived themselves of the right to examine him. He did not believe there was a member on that floor who, if Mr. Whitney would purge himself of the alleged contempt, would say he was in contempt. The matter of contempt rested in his own bosom, and no man could tell whether he had committed a contempt or not, so that it was useless to examine witnesses on this subject. The object of the resolution was not to rescind any rule of the House. He did not ask to rescind the rule, but only to suspend it for the purpose which he had stated above.

The SPEAKER stated the grounds of his decision, and read the order of the House which applied to the case; when

Mr. BOON moved to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. LEWIS wished to know, if by this decision of the CHAIR the accused was not to be called upon to answer as to the fact, whether it was fear which prevented him from appearing before the select committee.

The CHAIR said that would be for the House to determine after the order of the House had been complied with.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, as the accused will not say he is afraid to appear before the committee, is the House to call witnesses to prove that fact.

The CHAIR said this question was not debatable.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the effect of the decision the CHAIR is that Mr. Whitney is not to be called upon to give evidence.

The CHAIR said the gentleman was not in order. Debate could not be entertained when a motion was made to lay on the table.

The question was then taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 67, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Eifer, Farlin, Fowler, French, Galbraith, Gholson, Glascock, Grandland, Haley, Joseph Hall, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holsely, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Lane, Lansing, Gordon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Moses Mason, May, McKay, McKim, McLene, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, D. J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, John Thompson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, and Yell—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carter, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, C. ne, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dunlap, Elmore, Evans, Forester, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hardin, Harper, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howell, Huntman, Ingersoll, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Sampson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Rencher, Russell, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Sheperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, White, and Lewis Williams—67.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. LEWIS said he believed, as well as he could recollect, that he had voted for this rule, which had been adopted by the House, but at the time he gave that vote he very little expected that such a decision as this would have been given by the Speaker, and that too adopted by the House. He had then risen to know of the Speaker whether it was in order to move to suspend the examination of witnesses in this case.

The CHAIR said it would be in order to do so by a vote of two-thirds. He would state to the gentleman from Alabama, that he had made the decision alluded to in strict conformity with the order of the House.

Mr. LEWIS had not intended to make any impeachment of the Chair, but he wanted to know if it was not competent for the House to set aside this examination.

The CHAIR said not at this time unless by a vote of two-thirds. A witness was now on the stand, and an interrogatory propounded to him, and the House could not by a bare majority set aside this examination.

Mr. LEWIS would then take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, for the purpose of getting at this question.

The CHAIR said he had made no decision on which an appeal could be taken. The only motion the gentleman could make would be to suspend the rules.

Mr. LEWIS supposed that a vote of two-thirds was the only way by which it could be done, and he believed he could get a vote of two-thirds, if the House understood the question rightly. He desired to be in order, and the House would bear him witness that he seldom trespassed on their patience with long speeches.

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi inquired if the gentleman from Alabama was in order? If the rule prohibited debate, he must protest against it.

The CHAIR decided that debate was not then in order.

Mr. LEWIS. Is it in order to rescind this rule?

The CHAIR said a proposition identical with this had just been negatived.

Mr. LEWIS. Then the House has got itself in this singular predicament—

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi called the gentleman from Alabama to order.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman from Alabama was not in order. The witness, Mr. Fairfield, would proceed and give in his testimony. Mr. FAIRFIELD then sent to the Clerk's table the following answer to the first interrogatory:

At the commencement of the affair alluded to in the question, the different members of the committee were situated as follows, as near I can recollect: Mr. Whitney sat at a small table in a corner of the room, near the fireplace; Mr. Peyton, Mr. Garland, Mr. Hamer, and Mr. Gillet, sat at a long table, placed transversely in front of the fire, Mr. Hamer at the end nearest Mr. Whitney, Mr. Gillet at the opposite end, and Mr. Garland and Mr. Peyton in front, the latter nearest to Mr. Whitney, and with his back turned, or partially so, towards him—one preposing interrogatories, and the other answering, in writing, the questions and answers being handed to the chairman, and by him read to the committee. Mr. Wise, Mr. Martin, and myself were sitting upon a sofa at the side of the fireplace opposite Mr. Whitney. Mr. Pierce and Mr. Johnson were not present.

When the chairman read the answer of Mr. Whitney to the interrogatory of Mr. Peyton, both of which have been published, the latter turned towards Mr. Garland, without arising from his seat, and said, "Mr. Chairman, I wish you to inform this witness that he is not to insult me in his answers; if he does, God damn him, I will take his life upon the spot." He then rose and turned towards Mr. Whitney, and said, "I want you to understand, sir, that I claim no protection from the Constitution; and if you insult me, you damned dog, I will take your life." Mr. Wise rose and advanced to the side of Mr. Peyton, and addressing himself to Mr. Whitney, said, "Yes, this damned insolence is insufferable." Mr. Garland and other members of the committee were, during this time, endeavoring to preserve order, and to prevent an affray. Mr. Peyton turned from Mr. Whitney, and standing with his back to the fire, said, by way of soliloquy, or without addressing himself to any one in particular, "hitherto, I have treated him with marked respect—damn him—I have treated him just as if he had been a gentleman; to be thus insulted by a damn'd thief and robber! damn him, he shan't do it." While uttering the last words of this sentence, he became, apparently, more excited, and turned towards Mr. Whitney, who rose and said he claimed the protection of the committee while he was before it, when Mr. Peyton said, "God damn you, you shan't speak—you shan't say a word while you are in this room; if you do I will put you to death," and made towards him, at the same time putting his hand in his bosom. Mr. Wise, who had previously gone round the long table, and placed himself near Mr. Whitney, here interposed; and he, with Mr. Garland, who was standing between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney, and Mr. Martin, who was by his side, endeavored to calm him, and to prevent his going towards Mr. Whitney. Mr. Wise said, "Don't Peyton; damn him, he is not worth your notice," or words to that effect. Judge Martin here moved that the examination of the witness be suspended. Mr. Hamer opposed it; and addressing himself to the chairman, went on to make some remarks, but I do not distinctly recollect them.

Mr. Peyton then resumed his seat, but soon turned towards Mr. Whitney, and said, "Damn him, his eyes are on me. God damn him, he is looking at me—he shan't do it—damn him; he shan't look at me!" Mr. Hamer made some further remarks, when Mr. Garland suggested that the witness should retire to another room, which he did. Mr. Peyton then apologized to the committee, and Mr. Hamer offered the resolution, which has been published; on the passage of which, Mr. Whitney was recalled, and the resolution was communicated to the chairman. Mr. Whitney said, that if he had done any thing which the committee considered disrespectful, he regretted it, and apologized for it. Another interrogatory was proposed to him, which he answered; and then the committee rose.

Second question by Counsel.—What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indecorum or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer.—With the exception of the answer in writing of Mr. Whitney, which was the subject of a resolution introduced by Mr. Hamer, and adopted by the committee, I saw nothing of any indecorum or disrespect, on his part, to the committee, or any member of it; nor did I, at any time, except as above, and prior to the affair alluded to, hear any complaint on the part of any member of the committee.

Third question by Counsel.—Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unhappy scene in question, was or was not cool, collected, and forbearing; whether he did, or did not, manifest by word, deed, or gesture, or by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. Peyton. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner, as may go to show whether he meditated assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Mr. MASON of Ohio, objected to this interrogatory, and went on to state the grounds of his objections at length.

Mr. WALTER JONES, one of the counsel for Mr. Whitney, replied at some length to the objections raised by Mr. Mason.

Mr. MASON called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were not ordered; and the House decided that the question should be put without a division.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then returned the following:

Answer to the third interrogatory.—So far as I saw or heard, upon the occasion alluded to, the conduct of Mr. Whitney was cool, collected, and forbearing. I heard him say nothing but what I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory. In regard to the extent of what I saw, it is proper to add, that during nearly the whole time, several gentlemen were standing or moving between myself and Mr. Whitney. My attention also was principally confined to Mr. Peyton. I cannot say that Mr. Whitney did not assume any attitude of assault towards Mr. Peyton; but I can say, that if he did I did not see it.

First question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky.—Did, or did not Mr. Wise, endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. Peyton, and R. M. Whitney, by slipping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. Peyton, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer.—Mr. Wise did interfere, as I have stated in my first answer; he laid his hand upon Mr. Peyton's breast, and endeavored to prevent any collision between him and Mr. Whitney. I do not, however, recollect that he pushed him back.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise privately request the members of the Committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. Peyton being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? and did not Mr. Wise, at the time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer.—I answer affirmatively to the whole question.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did Mr. Wise do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. Peyton, did he do more than say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer.—Mr. Wise did not more than what I have described in my first answer. His object in going round the long table, and taking his stand near Mr. Whitney, I only know from his (Mr. Wise's) statement made in this House. I did not, at the time, regard it as assuming an attitude of attack upon Mr. Whitney.

Fourth question of Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did or did not Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. Peyton had occurred; and did not his examination occupy much time; and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. Peyton after the difficulty occurred?

Answer.—I answer affirmatively to the whole question, except as to the order of time in which the questions were propounded to Mr. Whitney. In regard to that I do not recollect distinctly.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky.—Had you, or had you not seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January last, which is as follows:

A CARD.

During the last session of Congress, it became necessary for me to expose H. A. Wise of having stated, in the Hall of the House, a BASE FALSEHOOD in relation to, myself.

In the Globe of this morning it is reported, that Balie Peyton, the Siamese companion of Wise for twelve months past, in uttering falsehood and slander, said that, "in consequence of the character of the agent alluded to, Mr. Taney, the former Secretary of the Treasury, would not recommend him as an agent of the deposit banks." No one can mistake that it is myself alluded to by Mr. P.

I challenge Mr. Peyton to adduce a single particle of proof to sustain the above assertion; and for having made it without proof, I pronounce him A CALUMNIATOR, AND GUILTY OF UTTERING A BASE FALSEHOOD; this, too, like Wise, while shielded by his constitutional privilege.

If any one who does not know me wishes to ascertain my character, I refer them to citizens of those places in which I have passed many years of my life.

R. M. WHITNEY.

Wednesday, 4th January, 1837.

And do you not know or believe that Mr. Peyton had seen said card, or was informed of its contents? and did not the answer to the question which preceded the difficulty, involve the truth of the charges which the card of Mr. Whitney pronounced to be false, and for the uttering of which he pronounced Mr. Peyton a calumniator?

Answer.—I had seen the card of Mr. Whitney, alluded to, and believe, from a remark I heard Mr. Peyton make in the committee room, that he also had seen it. The question referred to, as proposed by Mr. Peyton, I did regard as involving the truth of the charges which called out the card of Mr. Whitney.

First question of Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—I do not know that Mr. Peyton interposed at all, as I understand that word. I cannot, therefore, answer the question as to the language used by Mr. Whitney.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did Mr. R. M. Whitney use immediately before the witness says, "Mr. Peyton rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer.—If the question refers to what was said, my answer is, that Mr. Whitney said nothing that I recollect. If it refers to the written answer of Mr. Whitney, I cannot answer it without referring to the journal of the committee. It has, however, been correctly published.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remarks made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—I recollect that Mr. Peyton took his seat, but can't say whether it was when called to order by the chairman. I do not recollect of Mr. Whitney's rising but once prior to his withdrawing, and that, according to my present recollection, was before the time alluded to in the question.

First question by Committee.—Was, or was not, the deportment of Mr. Peyton, that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remark and conduct?

Answer.—Mr. Peyton, as I have before stated, treated Mr. Whitney with respect prior to the time of the difficulty. After the answer of Mr. Whitney was read by the chairman, Mr. Peyton was very much excited, and at one time certainly, appeared to be disposed to punish Mr. Whitney for his alleged insult.

Second question by Committee.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory, and what was the vote of the committee also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory, and will you now set them forth to be received in connection with, and as part of your answer to said interrogatory?

[Time given to witness to answer the foregoing second question of committee.]

Second question of Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, calling him off from R. M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with the left foot advanced?

Answer.—I do not recollect when Mr. Peyton rose the second time, but think it was not until Mr. Whitney retired, or about that time. When Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom he had just turned from a standing posture, as I have described in my answer to the first interrogatory. I doubt whether at that time I could see Mr. Whitney's right hand; but if I could, I do not recollect of seeing it in the position described in this question. My answer is the same with regard to Mr. Whitney's left foot.

Third question of Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—At the time the answer of Mr. Whitney was handed to the chairman, I sat nearly opposite Mr. Whitney, with nothing interposing. My attention, however, was fastened almost entirely upon Mr. Peyton.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—I do not recollect that he did.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL.—If it had been Mr. Peyton's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer.—He had.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after, the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he re-appeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—That part of the question relating to the number of interrogatories, and the time when they were proposed, I will answer after I have had an opportunity to refer to the journal of the committee. I did not apprehend insult or personal violence to Mr. Whitney, on the part of Mr. Peyton or Mr. Wise, when the former re-appeared in the committee room. Mr. Peyton's excitement had then subsided. I have already stated that prior and subsequent to this occurrence, Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treated Mr. Whitney respectfully in the committee room.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL.—Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel? and was it not remarked by Mr. Peyton, that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer.—There is such a rule; but I do not recollect the remark of Mr. Peyton supposed in the question.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not said witness refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one above alluded to, characterising them as inquisitorial, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—Mr. Whitney had refused to answer many questions proposed by Mr. Peyton, characterising them as inquisitorial. Though the committee permitted these questions to be put, I understood that the committee reserved the question as to the obligation of the witness to answer them, in case he did not choose voluntarily to do so.

Mr. THOMAS, with permission of the House, would submit a proposition which had met the approbation of all the members of the committee appointed to conduct the examination, together with the counsel of the accused, and several other gentlemen engaged in propounding questions, which would expedite the business. It was, in substance, ordering that, in future, the proceedings in the case of Reuben M. Whitney be postponed till 12 o'clock to-morrow, and that the Clerk of the House be directed to furnish each witness, to be thereafter examined, with a copy of the interrogatories already propounded to Mr. FAIRFIELD.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky would object to it, if its effect would be to cut off entirely the resolution he designed to offer.

The CHAIR said the adoption of this order would have no effect upon the gentleman's proposition.

This order was then adopted, nem. diss.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS was then directed to conduct Mr. WHITNEY from the bar; and,

On motion of Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky,

The House adjourned.

When the letters arrive at Great Britain, they are deposited in the Post Office, and there remain, as there is no one there to take them out. I have before me an advertisement in an English paper of twenty letters belonging to the U. States. So letters forwarded to the United States for the purpose of being sent to Great Britain, remain in our Post Offices. The petitioners desire that reciprocal arrangements may be entered into between the United States and Great Britain, by which each shall forward to the other all letters placed in their respective offices as above stated. It is understood such an arrangement has been made by Great Britain and France: referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. REED, by leave, presented the memorial of sixty masters of ships, praying for the erection of two light-houses, one at Cary's Fort reef, on the southeastern extremity of the coast of Florida, and one at Sambrero Keys. They recommend that the light-houses be built on the plan of the Tuscan Lights in St. George's channel.

Mr. REED said this petition was from men of experience and great practical knowledge. The light-houses prayed for he had no doubt were of vast importance as regards lives and property, and he hoped they would receive the particular attention of this House; referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOON, on leave, moved that the bill from the Senate to prohibit the sale of the public lands except to actual settlers in limited quantities, and for other purposes, and (at the suggestion of Mr. PATTON) also the bill to designate and limit the funds receivable for the revenue of the United States, be printed for the use of the House; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY asked leave to submit a motion to print an extra number of copies of the Geological Report, but it was objected to.

At the suggestion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and by general consent, the House took up such bills from the Senate on their first and second reading as would not be objected to.

A bill to alter and amend the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, approved 7th of April, 1790.

R. M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

Mr. Whitney being placed at the bar of the House, the examination of the honorable Mr. FAIRFIELD was continued.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he re-appeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—Prior to the difficulty alluded to in the question, Mr. Whitney had appeared before the committee, Jan. 12th, 13th and 14th, when fourteen interrogatories were propounded to him, principally by Mr. Peyton. On the 25th ten interrogatories were propounded, the eighth being the one which called forth the offensive answer. He appeared before the committee again on the 26th of January, when thirty-eight interrogatories were propounded, all by Mr. Peyton, but one.

Mr. GHOLSON'S second question in behalf of the Committee.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney, and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory; and what was the vote of the committee, also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory; and will you now set this forth to be received in connection with, and a part of your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer.—The question and answer alluded to were as follows, viz: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?"

Answer.—I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with, 'or did he, &c,' therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation, should be called to produce his proof."

The vote of the committee was, "that the foregoing answer to the 15th question, he returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee."

Ninth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not the resolution of the committee, returning the answer of the witness (Whitney) as disrespectful to a member of the committee, pass without a dissenting voice?

Answer.—It did.

Tenth question of Mr. BELL.—Look upon the journal of the committee, at page 84, and say on what day the 15th interrogatory was propounded? Did not said witness (Whitney) return and continue his examination as has been stated in your answer just given? Look upon the journal, at page 103, and state whether said witness did not voluntarily return and file written communications, as set forth in pages from 99 to 102 inclusive, as follows, namely: [Here follows a correspondence between R. M. Whitney, J. C. Wilkins, J. D. Beers, and John Tillson, Jr.] State whether Mr. Peyton did not propound to said witness, two other interrogatories at page 103, and receive answers as therein set forth, in addition to the questions and answers alluded to in your last answers.

Answer.—The fifteenth interrogatory was propounded Jan. 25th. Mr. Whitney returned, and the examination was continued as I have before stated. Mr. Whitney also voluntarily returned and filed the communications as set forth in pages from 99 to 102 inclusive, as supposed in the question. Two other questions were propounded at this time by Mr. Peyton, as set forth in page 103 of the journal of the committee. They were accidentally omitted by me in my former answer, not having received the printed journal beyond the 96th page.

Eleventh question of Mr. BELL.—Did Mr. Peyton take any exception to that part of his answer which alleges that an insinuation was made in his interrogatories, Nos. 48 to 42, propounded by him?

Answer.—Not to my recollection.

Twelfth question of Mr. BELL.—Please examine the interrogatories propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, (Whitney), and the answers thereto, commencing with No. 1, and including the following numbers, designated by a cross on the copy of the journal of the committee herewith furnished, and say if the course of the witness was not considered disrespectful to the committee, and especially to Mr. Peyton.

Answer.—I did not consider the answers of Mr. Whitney alluded to, as disrespectful either to the committee or Mr. Peyton, inasmuch as my opinion has been, from the beginning, that he was under no legal obligation to answer the interrogatories, or most of them, and as I considered the term "inquisitorial" to be used in a technical sense, and not with a disposition to be uncourteous to the committee or any member of it.

Thirteenth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Chief Justice Taney, in his evidence before the committee, disprove the allegation of the witness in his letter to Mr. Duane, late Secretary of the Treasury, so far as relates to his having, at any time, recommended him (Whitney) as a fit person to be an agent of the deposit banks or of the Treasury?

Answer.—Chief Justice Taney's evidence is not before me, and if it were, it might perhaps be questioned whether it was competent for me to say what degree of evidence amounts to proof. For a further answer of the question, I refer to the letter of Mr. Whitney, and the answers of Mr. Taney, alluded to in the question, both of which are in the possession of the committee.

Fourteenth question of Mr. BELL.—How far was Mr. Peyton sitting from the witness (Whitney) at the time of the commencement of the occurrence to which you have alluded? State also whether Mr. Peyton was not setting nearer to the witness than any other member of the committee. State also whether Mr. Peyton was not standing still at the time he had his hand in his bosom, and when Mr. Wise apprehended him.

Answer.—At the commencement of the occurrence alluded to, Mr. Peyton was sitting within a few feet of Mr. Whitney, say three to six feet, and was nearer Mr. Whitney than any other member of the committee. I think Mr. Peyton was not standing still at the time named in the question, but was endeavoring to advance, and was resisted in so doing principally by Mr. Wise.

Fifteenth question of Mr. BELL.—Have you, or any other person to your knowledge, had any conversation with the said R. M. Whitney since the occurrence in the committee? If so, did he inform you then that he was alarmed, and that his fears had induced him to take the course which he has done in this matter? State all he said in relation to his fears, or the motives which induced his course upon this occasion.

Answer.—I do not know what conversation others have had with Mr. Whitney upon this subject. I have had none. I had no acquaintance with Mr. Whitney prior to being appointed on the select committee, and have since carefully abstained from conversation with him. Upon one occasion, however, since the occurrence of the 25th of January, I was in the company of Mr. Whitney a few minutes, who made some remarks upon the subject, not addressed to me particularly. So far as I can recollect them, they were in substance, that he was not afraid of Mr. Peyton at the time alluded to; that he (Whitney) was not armed at the time, but intended, if Mr. Peyton had drawn a weapon, to have sprung forward, caught his arm, and flung him into the fireplace. This was before he had sent a petition to the House, and before his arrest for an alleged contempt.

First question of Mr. RENCHER.—In the subsequent examinations before the committee to which R. M. Whitney was placed to submit, after the occurrence between him and Mr. Peyton, did he exhibit fears of personal violence from Mr. Wise, or from any other member of the committee?

Answer.—I have seen no indications of fear on the part of Mr. Whitney.

Second question of Mr. RENCHER.—Was the conduct of Mr. Wise, or any other member of the committee calculated to create such fears?

Answer.—Excepting the time of the occurrence of the 25th of January, I answer negatively.

Fourth question by Counsel.—Did Mr. Wise at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going round the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? And was the statement of Mr. Wise, as to his purpose in that movement before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed?

Answer.—I was not present when Mr. Wise made the statement alluded to, in this House, on I think Saturday the 4th of February. My information was derived from conversation with members who were present, and from the report of his remarks in the Globe and Intelligencer of this city. I think the testimony of Mr. Whitney had closed prior to that time.

Fifth question by Counsel.—In your foregoing answers, touching the interrogations propounded to Mr. Whitney before the committee, do you refer to any questions put to Mr. Whitney by Mr. Peyton, or by others of the committee, or to any of his answers or refusals to answer, but what are recorded in the journal of the committee, and found in the printed copy of that journal referred to in the foregoing interrogations; and is that a copy printed by order of the committee. If so, annex the whole of it to your answer?

Answer. I have referred to the questions and answers, and refusals to answer, which have been published by the committee, and to them alone. I annex the journal so far as it has been printed by order of the committee:

[Here follow from pages 1 to 112, inclusive, of printed journal of the select committee.]

Sixth question of the Counsel.—Are not the evidence of Chief Justice Taney or Mr. Duane, recorded in the journal of the committee?

Answer.—I presume it is; but I have run my eye rapidly over the printed journal, and do not find the evidence there.

Seventh question by Counsel.—Was Mr. Whitney present at, or ever apprised of the examination of Chief Justice Taney or Mr. Duane, or of the nature of their evidence, or to adduce any corroboration of his own, in case any discrepancy should appear?

Answer.—He was not present, nor was he apprised of the examination of Mr. Taney and Mr. Duane to my knowledge.

MR. HAMER'S TESTIMONY.

First question by the Counsel for the accused.—Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee, whereof Mr. GARLAND is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and Peyton, as members of that committee and all that occurred on that occasion.

Mr. HAMER'S answer to the first interrogatory of the counsel.—The following statement is copied in part from one made out some days ago, and shown to me by the Hon. Mr. Fairfield, a member of the committee, who was present at the affair described. It is so far altered as to make it accord with my own recollection of the facts, and it is substantially true as they occurred. I cannot be precise as to the very words used by the parties, nor as to the exact order of time in which all the events transpired; nor can I pretend to relate every thing that was said and done during the excitement.

The position of the several persons in the room was as described by Mr. Fairfield. The chairman and Mr. Peyton between the long table and the fire; Messrs. Martin, Gillet, Fairfield, and Wise, at the end of the table, either upon or beside the sofa, which stands at the left side of the fireplace; and myself at the other end of the table, close to Mr. Peyton. The witness sat beside a small table in the corner, on the right of the fireplace.

When Mr. Peyton heard the answer to his interrogatory read, he turned towards the chairman and said: "Mr. Chairman, I wish you to inform this witness that he is not to insult me in his answers; if he does, God damn him, I will take his life upon the spot." About this time Mr. Wise rose from the sofa and said: "Yes; the damned insolence of this witness is insufferable." Mr. Peyton said to Mr. Wise, "Never mind, this is my business;" and rising, and turning towards Mr. Whitney, said: "I want you to understand, sir, that I claim no protection from the Constitution, and if you insult me to my face, you damned dog, I will take your life." During this time, the chairman and others were vainly endeavoring to restore order.

Mr. Peyton turned from the witness, and presently said, "Hubert I have treated him with marked respect; damn him, I have treated him as if he had been a gentleman; to be insulted in this way by a damned thief and robber! Damn him, he shan't do it." About this time Mr. Whitney (who, I think, had not said a word before) said: "Mr. Chairman, I am here as a witness, and I claim the protection of the committee." Mr. Peyton said, "God damn you, you shan't speak—you shan't say a word while you are in this room; if you do, I will put you to death! You shall make your statements in writing." Previous to this, Mr. Wise had gone around the table, and was standing near the witness; and, immediately after this declaration of Mr. Peyton, Mr. Wise passed between the witness and Mr. Peyton, and seized the latter, saying, "Don't Peyton; damn him, he is not worth your notice." Mr. Peyton endeavored to disengage himself, and replied: "Yes he is, when he insults me to my face; if he were a dog, I would notice him." I did not see Mr. Peyton put his hand in his bosom; nor did I see arms of any kind during the affair.

About this time Mr. Martin moved to suspend the examination, to which I objected, and proceeded to address the Chair, amidst frequent interruptions. Mr. Peyton resumed his seat, but soon turning towards the witness, said: "Damn him, his eyes are on me—God damn him, he is looking at me. He shan't do it; damn him, he shan't look at me!" The chairman directed the witness to retire from the room, and he did so. I concluded my remarks, and then offered the resolution, which was adopted by the committee. Mr. Peyton apologized to the committee for the course he had pursued. The witness was called in, and the resolution read to him, when he also apologized, as is stated upon the journal of the committee. The examination then proceeded, and, after a short time, the committee adjourned until the next morning.

Previous to this time I had seen nothing in the conduct of either Mr. Peyton or Mr. Wise, towards the witness, which was at all indecorous or disrespectful; nor was there any thing afterwards, during the course of his examination.

On the part of Mr. Whitney I saw nothing disrespectful towards either of those gentlemen, either before or subsequent to this transaction. I did not see the frowns or scowling looks attributed to the witness; though I distinctly recollect that Mr. Peyton complained of them at the time. Nor did I see Mr. Whitney's hand in his pocket during the affair, though I did not watch him narrowly; for, believing that he assumed a defensive attitude, and would not rush upon Mr. Peyton, my attention was rather directed to him; intending, if he attempted, in the excitement of the moment, to move upon Mr. Whitney, to step between them, and endeavor to prevent a conflict. Mr. Wise interposed, and saved me the necessity of doing so.

As to Mr. Wise's intention of shooting or killing the witness, I neither saw nor heard any thing of that evening; but heard him avow it afterwards, in a public conversation, as well as in the House, and in language similar to that used on the floor. With the exception of his first movement, his course seemed to me, at the time, to be rather peaceful than otherwise; and dictated by a desire to prevent a personal rencontre between Mr. Peyton and the witness. I do not recollect any other material circumstance; but, after what has been said, both in the House and in the publications of the day, it is but an act of justice to myself to add a few words in regard to the proceedings of the committee.

Before this period we had received and read Mr. Whitney's protest, in which he assigns his reasons, at large, for not answering certain classes of questions. His examination progressed with this protest before us; and when he declined answering certain classes he often did, it was, of course, for reasons set forth in that paper; and it was deemed unnecessary and improper for him to give reasons for declining, in each case, when he did not choose to answer an interrogatory.

Again: it was well known that Mr. Peyton had, more than once, denounced the witness in very strong terms, on the floor of the House of Representatives, and that the latter had, but a few days prior to this affair, published a "card," in relation to Mr. Peyton, which was couched in very offensive language. They were not on speaking terms. All the questions, answers, and suggestions which passed between them were transmitted through the chairman. Under such circumstances, it was believed to be not only an obvious violation of the rules of propriety, but "disrespectful," for the witness, after refusing to answer an interrogatory, to proceed to give reasons for his refusal, which reflected personally upon the member, who, by the permission of the committee, had propounded the question. It was calculated to provoke a quarrel, and it was this offence, on the part of the witness, which the resolution was intended to rebuke. If witnesses, under the pretext of giving reasons, for not answering questions, could be allowed to retort upon the member of a committee, or of a court, they might thus heap upon them individually and collectively, whatever odium happened to suit their interests or inclination. Such a practice could not be tolerated before any tribunal; and in this case, it was so.

Whether, as between parties who were not personally unfriendly, the reply would have been considered disrespectful; or whether the provocation was sufficient to justify all the scenes which followed, were other and very different questions; and as to which the committee did not feel called upon to express an opinion. Such, at least, were my sentiments, and so far as I conversed with the members, I understood them to be theirs also.

I understand it has been said that we ought to have brought this affair immediately before the House. It would have been strange if we had. Scenes not unlike it have occurred on several occasions during the last three years, and the uniform practice of the House has been to resort to every means in its power necessary to produce a reconciliation, and restore harmony, sometimes remaining in session for hours to accomplish the object. We but followed the example of the honorable body whose committee we were, and after a restoration of order and harmony, which enabled us to proceed with our business. In submitting a statement, which is to be recorded and published, it is due to the occasion, and to the part I bore in the proceedings, to add these explanatory remarks to the narrative of facts which I have given as testimony.

Second question by Counsel.—What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indecorum or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer.—His conduct was respectful; with the exception of this affair between him and Mr. Peyton. In that case, the committee returned his answer as disrespectful.

Third question by Counsel.—Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unhappy scene in question, was or was not cool, collected, and forbearing; whether he did, or did not, manifest by word, deed, or gesture, or by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. Peyton. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner, as may go to show whether he meditated assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Answer.—Mr. Whitney was apparently cool and forbearing. I saw now no disposition manifested, on his part, to become an assailant.

First question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney, by slipping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. Peyton, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer.—He did.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise privately request the members of the committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. Peyton being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? and did not Mr. Wise, at the time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer.—He expressed such sentiments to me.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did Mr. Wise do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. Peyton, did he do more than say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer.—He made other remarks, but I do not recollect them.

Fourth question of Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. Peyton had occurred; and did not his examination occupy much time; and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. Peyton after the difficulty occurred?

Answer.—They treated him with respect both before and after; his examination occupied much time, and I believe most of the questions were asked afterwards. The journal will answer the latter inquiry.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Had you, or had you not seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January last?

Answer.—This card was given in Mr. Fairfield's testimony.

And do you not know or believe that Mr. Peyton had seen said card, or was informed of its contents? and did not the answer to the question which preceded the difficulty, involve the truth of the charges which the card of Mr. Whitney pronounced to be false, and for the uttering of which he pronounced Mr. Peyton a calumniator?

Answer.—I had seen the "card," and so had Mr. Peyton. He took the Globe out of my hand to read the "card," and conversed with me about it in the committee room. I understand the answer of the witness, as referring to that "card," or to the charge discussed and denied in that publication.

First question of Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—None that I have heard.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did Mr. R. M. Whitney use immediately before the witness says, "Mr. Peyton rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer.—He did nothing, immediately after Mr. Peyton rose.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remarks made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—I think not. I believe he had been seated, though, before Mr. Whitney commenced speaking. At the time the witness spoke, I believe Mr. Peyton was standing.

Second question of Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, calling him off from R. M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with the left foot advanced?

Answer.—He did not. I did not see his hand to his bosom, nor did I see the right hand or left foot.

Third question of Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—I did not see his face at that moment.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—He did.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL.—If it had been Mr. Peyton's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer.—He had.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after, the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he re-appeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—The journal of the committee will show the number of questions propounded before and after; I apprehended no danger to the witness when he re-appeared. He was treated courteously, both before and after that occurred, by all the members of the committee.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL.—Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel? and was it not remarked by Mr. Peyton, that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer.—There was such a rule; I have given Mr. Peyton's words in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not said witness, refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one above alluded to, characterizing them as inept, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—He had.

First question by Committee.—Was, or wasnot, the deportment of Mr. Peyton, that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remark and conduct?

Answer to Mr. GHOLSON'S first interrogatory in behalf of the Committee.—His deportment was angry and violent. I cannot say what were his motives or intentions.

Ninth question of Mr. BELL.—How far was Mr. Peyton sitting from the witness, (Whitney) at the time of the commencement of the occurrence to which you have alluded? State also whether Mr. Peyton was not sitting nearer to the witness than any other member of the committee. State also whether Mr. Peyton was not standing still at the time he had his hand in his bosom, and when Mr. Wise approached him.

Answer.—I cannot tell the precise distance they were apart; perhaps five or six feet. Mr. Peyton was nearer than any member except myself. I sat at the end of the table, and was quite as near the witness, I think, as he was. At the time Mr. Peyton is said to have had his hand in his bosom, I did not see him advance towards the witness by taking a step; though he was not entirely still.

Second question by Committee.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory, and what was the vote of the committee also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory, and will you now set them forth to be received in connection with, and as part of your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer.—An extract from the journal of the committee will show the question, answer and vote.

Fourth question of the Counsel.—In your answer to the first question of the accused, you speak of Mr. Peyton's complaining of Mr. Whitney's scowl or looks at the time. Do you refer to any other time, or to any other complaint of Mr. Peyton, but what had been stated in the former part of your same answer, as uttered by Mr. Peyton just before the chairman directed Mr. Whitney to retire, to wit: "Mr. Peyton resumed his seat, but soon turning towards the witness, said, damn him, his eyes are on me; God damn him, he is looking at me; damn him, he hasn't look."

Answer.—I do not refer to the complaint of Mr. Peyton, that the witness's eyes were upon him, &c. Before the committee resumed the examination, Mr. Peyton mentioned that at the time the witness handed his answer to the chairman, he frowned or scowled upon him, (Mr. Peyton.) I think his remarks upon this point were made at the time he (Mr. Peyton) was apologizing for his conduct.

First question of Mr. OWENS.—Was the propriety or pertinency of the answer of Mr. Whitney to the question propounded by Mr. Peyton discussed by the committee, or any member of it, before or after Mr. Whitney returned from the room, or was there any dissenting opinion on the subject?

Answer.—The propriety of the answer was discussed in the committee by myself, and opinions expressed in regard to it, I think, by others. There was no dissenting opinion that I heard, from the vote of the committee declaring the answer to be an improper one.

Tenth question of Mr. BELL.—Have you read, in the daily Intelligencer of the 7th instant, the statement of Messrs. Peyton and Wise, in relation to the occurrence in the committee on the 25th January? If yes, please state whether their statements are substantially correct; if you have not read the statements in the Intelligencer, please read them, and state as before requested.

Answer.—I read these statements some days ago. A comparison of them with the narrative which I have just given, will show how far I think them correct. I do not know any thing further I could add, unless I should give an opinion as to their general agreement with my own statement.

Eleventh question by Mr. BELL.—Did any member of this House complain to you of the conduct of the committee in failing to report the proceedings in the committee on the 25th of January to the House; and also whether any member of this House has avowed to you that his object in supporting the proposition to bring Mr. Whitney before the House, was to go into the examination of the conduct of Messrs. Peyton and Wise upon the occasion referred to?

Answer.—Several members of the committee have declared to me that the committee ought to have reported the affair to the House. I do not recollect that any one has said that his motive in voting for the investigation, was to examine the conduct of Messrs. Peyton and Wise. Some gentleman have expressed the opinion to me, that after all that had been said in relation to this matter, it was due to the House and to the country, that the facts should be made known as they really transpired.

First question by Mr. PEYTON. Do you understand from your knowledge of the sentiments of the members of this House that their chief object in supporting and bringing Mr. Whitney before the House, for an alleged contempt of its authority, was to lay the circumstances of the occurrence in the committee room before the world, and from all you know on that subject, do you believe that such was the object of any portion of the members of this House? If yes, state all the facts and circumstances upon which that understanding and belief rests.

Mr. McKEON remarked that he objected to the question, on the ground that it proposed to ask the witness his opinions on a certain subject. He made opposition with clean hands. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) might be assured that he (Mr. McKeon) had no wish to extend this investigation beyond the limits of the issue made by the accused. He (Mr. McKeon) had nothing to do with bringing the accused to the bar. He had, from the commencement, arrayed himself against the arrest of that individual. The great mass of his political friends were to be found in the minority on that question. If Mr. Whitney's contempt, however, was to be made the foundation of an examination into the opinions of members of this House, it would establish a principle opening new issues in the present controversy, and leading to interminable debates on questions which would inevitably follow that now proposed. He wished the matter brought to a close. He appealed to the gentleman who offered it to consider the consequence of making inquiry into the private, confidential conversations of gentlemen upon this floor. He appealed to him whether it would not be calculated to excite feelings any other than pleasant between those where none but those of a friendly nature should exist? Whether it would not be converting this House into an inquisitorial tribunal, employing the torture to extort opinions from its victims?

Mr. PEYTON said: The gentleman from New York (Mr. McKeon) objects to the question propounded by me, to the witness, on the ground of form, and as calculated to elicit hearsay evidence. I wish, in the first instance, to set the gentleman right in that regard. The question is intended to bring out facts and circumstances within the knowledge of the witness. Facts and circumstances going to establish what? Why, whether this investigation has been entered into bona fide, or whether it is not rather a shameless fraud, attempted to be perpetrated by the ostensible accused, but real prosecutor, aided and abetted by members of this House, to affect the reputation of my friend from Virginia and myself. That, sir, is the scope and meaning of the question. And here I take occasion to say, in justice to my own feelings, no less than to those of the honorable gentleman to whom it is propounded, that I know him to be utterly incapable of having any thing to do with this transaction; nor do I know whether he is in possession of any facts or circumstances which I could almost say I know to exist, tending to prove a combination between certain members of this body, acting in concert with others out of it, to put my friend and myself on trial instead of the accused, as he is technically called. Sir, I wish that I could point them out, but I cannot; and that is the reason why I seek evidence to establish the fact of a conspiracy, so unjust in its objects, so insidious in its means to attain them, and so disgraceful to the parties concerned.

The CHAIR said that it was not in order to indulge in reflections upon members of the House.

Mr. YELL said he would thank the gentleman to name the members.

Mr. CLABORNE of Mississippi united in that wish. Mr. PEYTON resumed. I unite with both these gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, in the wish which they have expressed. I, too, want names, and I mean to have them, if it be possible. Gentlemen have heretofore clamored for proof, and, so far as I am concerned, they shall have it. The gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. Yell) need not have assumed a sensitiveness, for which I am sure there is no occasion, and call on me for names, which he must have known, for I had just said, that I could not give.

But gentlemen need not expect to get off so soon, and so easily, as they have probably hoped; for if this House, or rather the majority of it, do not shrink and back out from the position which they have taken—and I do trust that they will not—I dare them to stand up to it. We will, I doubt not, have names, and facts too, amply sufficient to bear me out in what I have said. If there be witnesses to prove that secret conclaves have been held with the accused, and that this "unfortunate affair," as it has been pathetically called, has been thrust into this hall, not for the purpose of affecting him, but of putting two members of this House upon their trial.

Mr. CUSHMAN called the gentleman to order. The CHAIR. The gentleman from Tennessee is reminded that he must not reflect upon the members of this House, or any individual member of it.

Mr. PEYTON. I did not allude to any individual member, for I have repeatedly said that it was out of my power to do so. The CHAIR again reminded the gentleman that he must not reflect upon the House as a body, or upon any of its members.

Mr. PEYTON. Why, sir, it is all conjecture on my part. Though there are circumstances strong enough to produce conviction on my mind, that the conduct in this matter, I will not say of whom, but of gentlemen, is in an attitude as suspicious as the most damning proof could place it. This is my conviction. But I want the proof to satisfy others. I propose and expect—indeed, have no doubt of being able—to prove by witnesses—if we can be permitted to examine them—that there was an understanding—whether proper or improper. I will not say—between the said R. M. Whitney and divers honorable members of this House.

Mr. YELL begged leave just to ask the gentleman—The CHAIR interposing, said that it was out of order for any other member to address the House.

Mr. PEYTON. I give way, sir, with great pleasure. The CHAIR said that it would only be done by general consent.

No member objecting. Mr. YELL would then ask the gentleman from Tennessee, whether, in any part of this transaction, from beginning to end, he intended to allude to him, (Mr. Y.) either in the vote which he had given to bring the accused to the bar, or for any other part he had taken in the matter?

Mr. PEYTON. I will do the gentleman the justice to say that I never thought of him at all; and if he had not interrupted me by his frequent calls for information, I should not have recollected that he was in the House.

Mr. YELL was glad that the gentleman had informed the House that no intimacy existed between them.

Mr. PEYTON. I expect to prove, Mr. Speaker, that this whole proceeding is a contrivance to give Whitney the eclat and triumph of bringing my friend and myself to the bar of this House, for the purpose of holding us up, so far as that object could be effected, to the indignation of this House and of the country. Sir, there never has been any design, other than this, in getting up and carrying out this prosecution; and all those patriotic appeals, those beautiful apostrophes to liberty, those moving pictures of a citizen in vinculis, or in the shambles, which, for several days past, have been addressed to our sympathies, do not in fact apply to the accused, as he is called, but, if to any one, are applicable to my friend from Virginia and myself. Possibly I may not be able to prove this; but I want, at least, the opportunity to try. And it is my purpose, if permitted by the House, to examine every gentleman whom I may believe to possess any information in relation to it. If I fail, then, in establishing the facts, it will be in consequence of a want of knowledge on the part of the witnesses.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no question now in regard to the real object of this investigation; that it is intended to affect my friend from Virginia and myself. And how does it happen that we are thus arraigned before the Congress of the United States, and before the American people, for a contempt of R. M. Whitney? By what indirection has it been made to take this direction? This is what I desire to know, sir. And if the House permit me, I will adduce evidence so irresistible that gentlemen who now hold their heads high, will be made to shrink and cower before the public indignation. Sir, shall I not be permitted to do this? If attacks be made upon honest men, in or out of this House, are they to be denied the poor privilege of demonstrating their falsehood?

Will those gentlemen who seem to take so deep and sensitive an interest in the feelings and character and honor, yes, sir, the honor, of their friend, deny us this privilege? Will they, can they withhold it from us, honorably and compatibly with their sense of justice as men and as members? No, sir; they will not, cannot. My purpose is to hold them up to the issue which themselves have made. I am ready to go on, and go through, with my trial—to submit to any ordeal of investigation, however searching, which may be forced upon me. But I want justice dealt out with an even hand. We who are on trial, cannot be supposed to know all the black and disgraceful circumstances which belong to this transaction; but we wish to prove them by witnesses, and we will prove them, if possible, be the consequences what they may.

In conclusion, sir, I repeat that I make no accusations against individuals, because I am in possession of no fact implicating individuals by name. If I were, I would make it known. But I reiterate, again and again, my call for the proof; and if it be such as I believe it will be, nay, almost know it must be, then let gentlemen, if they can, draw the distinction between themselves and their friend, R. M. Whitney.

On motion, The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE. FRIDAY, FEB. 17, 1837.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Treasury Department, made in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, accompanied by copies of letters from the Hon. On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the same were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR communicated a memorial from a number of citizens of the city of Washington, praying that the building for the Post Office Department, to be erected, may be erected on the site occupied by the ruins of the old one: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Mercy Perry; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the petition of sundry citizens of Nantucket, praying for the erection of two small light-houses on that island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and

Also, the petition of Master Commandant John Percival, of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of sundry citizens of New Jersey, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the reception of the petition; and On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the question of its reception was laid on the table.

Mr. EWING of Ohio presented a memorial from a convention lately held in that State for the formation of an anti-slavery society, protesting against the recognition of the independence of Texas until slavery shall be abolished by the Government of that country.

Mr. PRESTON objected to the reception of the memorial; and

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the question of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. PRENTISS presented a petition from sundry citizens of Vermont; and

Mr. WEBSTER presented several petitions from citizens of Massachusetts.

Mr. PRESTON objected to their reception; and

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the questions of reception were laid on the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial and joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Indiana, on the subject of the adjustment of claims to lands of certain French inhabitants in and near Vincennes;

Also, the joint resolutions of the same, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law to cede to the State, at the minimum price, the alternate sections of land reserved on the line of the Wabash and Erie canal;

Both of which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the message of the President of the United States, of the 15th instant, on the subject of the claim of Stockton and Stokes and others, made a special report thereon; which was read.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which had been referred the petition of Gastano Carusi, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TOMLINSON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill extending pensions to certain widows; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KENT, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of David Peter and William Adams, deceased; which was read twice and referred.

The following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PRESTON was considered:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate the proceedings of the court of inquiry, recently held at the city of Frederick, by virtue of orders No. 65 and No. 68, so far as the same relates to the causes of delay in opening and prosecuting the campaigns in Georgia and Alabama in the year 1835.

Mr. PRESTON said that it was with a deep feeling of regret, he had seen in the official paper of yesterday, a communication from the President of the United States, relative to the result at which the court of inquiry convened at Frederick had arrived, in reference to the case of General Scott. He could wish to see removed the imputation at present resting against the character of that brave and gallant officer removed at once, and he was disappointed at not seeing in the communication in question, such an expression of feeling as would have indicated the favorable opinion of the Executive, as regarded the result of the inquiry into the conduct of General Scott.

Under ordinary circumstances, he (Mr. P.) should be the last to move in a matter of this kind; but, in looking at the precedents existing, he found it was not unusual to make calls in connection with subjects like the present; he had therefore made this call for the satisfaction of Congress and of the public. And he believed that if ever there was an occasion for Congress and the people to know what had been done in reference to a court of inquiry, this was the case. General Scott's reputation, had been exposed, and placed in an equivocal position as far back as June last, when he was superseded in the command of the army in the Creek war. He was superseded in consequence of a letter written by Major General Jesup, directed to the Editor of the Globe, and marked "private," but which that individual showed to the President of the United States, and it was afterwards published to the world. The result of these proceedings was, that General Scott, in the performance of his duty, was recalled, and arraigned before a court under certain charges. And not only had he, who occupied so high a station in our army, which he won through blood and slaughter, been thus superseded in his command, and laid under this suspicion, to say the least of it, but the subordinate officer who penned a letter to the publisher of a Washington newspaper has been advanced to the command. Yet his accuser had been taken from his legitimate sphere, and placed in a situation where he would have an opportunity of reaping those laurels, which General Scott himself might have reaped had he been allowed to retain his command.

He (Mr. P.) had looked at the results of the court of inquiry, on many accounts, with great anxiety, not only as concerned the distinguished General himself, but the honor and character of the country, which were deeply implicated in this transaction; and whatever might be done, if bearing the character of justice to him, it was injustice to us, and our national character. We should be deficient in proper pride, and in gratitude to individuals such as he, who have rendered so many important services to the country, if we did not take care to see that they have justice dealt them fairly and impartially.

The President of the United States, it appeared, had thought proper to publish his dissent of the proceedings of the court of inquiry, which Mr. P. believed not to be entirely finished. He conceived the proceedings of the court to be private, unless the Executive should think proper to make them known. The seal of secrecy having then been broken, and the President having published to the world the secret, with his opinions upon the proceedings of the court, it struck him (Mr. P.) that Congress was placed in a situation to demand the testimony, and to give their opinion upon it.

He would not array the names of any individuals before the country. His anxiety was on account of General Scott, as allied to dignity, pride, and sense of honor of the army. He would have the voice of the people heard on the subject, if any improper proceeding had taken place. Nay, he would go further; he would have it corrected by Congress. Mr. P. continued by expressing his hope that the Senate would indulge him in allowing him to call for the information he desired.

Mr. CRITTENDEN remarked that he would wish that Gen. Scott should have ample justice done him for all the wrongs he had suffered; and intimated his impression that the papers had probably been remitted to the court, consequently the Senator's resolution, if adopted, would be unavailing.

Mr. WRIGHT said that if the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, they would be able to ascertain whether the Senator's object could be accomplished; but it was probable that the proceedings had been referred back to the court of inquiry. Mr. W. then moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRESTON was glad to see that gentlemen concurred with him in getting the papers. If, however, the President should not be able to answer the call of the Senate, why then there was an end to the matter.

Mr. BENTON regarded the resolution as calling for proceedings in a case which had not yet terminated. He presumed that the proceedings sent to the President had been remitted to the court. It was, therefore, an unfinished affair. And he should consider it an act of usurpation, on the part of Congress, to take the matter out of the hands of the constituted authorities, who had not yet finished their action on it. That would be doing nothing less than to forestall public opinion, and the public judgment, with respect to the inquiry. He held it was the duty of Congress to refrain from expressing their opinion upon the facts, until the President should have approved or disapproved of the opinions of the court. And, if the resolution was to pass at all, it should contain this proviso: "provided the proceedings of the court of inquiry are finished."

Mr. PRESTON said, whether the affair was finished or unfinished, he could not take upon himself to say. But this he would say, that he had not been able to find a single instance in which the President had published his decision upon the proceedings of a court of inquiry until they were finished. Well, then, as the President had published this communication in the Globe, it might be presumed that finished the affair. Be that as it might, he conceived there was no good ground for the assertion which had been made, that to send the Senate the papers called for, would be to forestall the President in his decision, which he (Mr. P.) imagined to have been set forth in the official paper yesterday.

Mr. CUTHBERT presumed that his friend from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) would himself be of opinion that there should be no proceeding, on the part of Congress, which would mingle up military matters with political feelings; and there could be nothing more at war with the chivalrous character of the soldier than to embroil him in political strife. This being confessed, it would be most unfortunate for the Senate to rush precipitately into matters of this kind, involving our officers in difficulties so uncongenial with their pursuits or their feelings, which it would be easy to commence, but which could not be terminated at their pleasure. The only matter which it appeared that his friend from S. Carolina objected to, was the form given to the subject by the publication of the President's opinion. It was not the reference that the gentleman objected to; nor did he assert that the President was in error; but he only complained that the publication of the President's opinion would operate injuriously on General Scott. The general, he believed the universal practice of courts of inquiry, was to furnish an abstract of the evidence given before it, with the reasoning connecting that evidence together. That was not the course pursued by this court. A bare acquittal was rendered, without giving the facts on which it was founded, and an opinion was presented as to the general complexion of the evidence, without a reference to the facts which led to the formation of that opinion. Such a general report would not be satisfactory to the public, and was not doing justice to General Scott himself; and it surely would be desirable to his friends that the court should present an abstract of the evidence, in order that the country might render the same verdict of acquittal. There was another point in the proceedings of this court to which he would call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina, and that was the extreme irregularity by which they referred to matters not properly before them, and commented with extraordinary bitterness on the conduct of Gen. Jesup. Were they assembled to inquire into the conduct of Gen. Jesup? Were they authorized to pronounce censure on him in relation to a matter with which they had nothing to do? The very circumstance of their having travelled out of the line of their duty, and referred, without any authority whatever, to the conduct of an officer not before them, was a sufficient reason why the President should send back to them the record of their proceedings. It appeared to him that it was unfortunate, for the well-being of the army, that a spirit of faction and rivalry had been in more than one instance manifested; and he thought that Congress, so far from entering into any proceedings which might seem to give countenance to feelings of jealousy and ill-will on the part of our officers to each other, ought to do all in its power to discourage them.

Mr. BENTON observed that the court had not acted according to the order under which it was convened, and that was to report the facts growing out of the inquiry with their opinions thereon. The disapproval of the President then, was on account of the non-compliance with the order. Mr. B. considered the case as fully before the court of inquiry as it was before; as much so as though they had made no report on the proceedings. He repeated that it would be an act of usurpation on the part of the Senate to interfere and forestall public opinion before the President's opinion was expressed. The President's opinion, as expressed in the communication published in the Globe of yesterday, disapproves of the conduct of the court, not of the officer alluded to.

Mr. PRESTON made a few remarks expressive of his regret that the Senator from Georgia, (Mr. Cuthbert), should have made the observations he had as to a spirit of rivalry and jealousy actuating the officers of the army. He (Mr. P.) had said nothing to call forth the remark, nor had he entered into any comparison of the military talents of Generals Scott and Jesup.

Mr. RIVES was desirous that a course should be taken which would have the effect of awarding to that distinguished officer, General Scott, the full measure of justice. He (Mr. R.) did not wish that any act should be done by this body which should be nugatory. If it were true, however, that the proceedings in relation to the case of General Scott, had been remitted to the court, the adoption of the resolution in question would be nugatory, and could produce no result. Now he thought the proper reference of it would be to the military committee. He could not agree with the Senator from Missouri—the expression was too strong—that it would be an act of usurpation to forestall the opinion of the President, but he would say, that it might be irregular. Mr. R. then went on to say that he felt deeply in regard to the character of General Scott, and he did not doubt, whatever might be the decision of the President, the nation would do him justice. But he (Mr. R.) was desirous that this military question might not be mingled with any thing of a political character. He believed that there would be very little delay, so far as the case of General Scott was concerned, the papers being referred back, merely for the purpose of collating, and affording an opportunity to the court to give the information, not furnished, to enable the President to judge of the facts, and thereby make up an opinion. Mr. R. apprehended that the reputation of General Scott, was composed of too durable materials to be affected by a little delay, and that he entertained no doubt the General would have justice done him. He thought the resolution should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CUTHBERT knew that it was not impossible but that a Senator, out of personal vanity, and in the mere struggle for victory, might continue a debate after all the arguments on either side had been exhausted, and long after the whole Senate wished the debate to cease. He should, therefore, avoid taxing the patience of the Senate by an unnecessary recapitulation of what had already been touched upon, and what was well understood, and with one single observation, would resume his seat. His friend from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) took up the paper purporting to be the decision of the court, and asked, were not these [the parts read by him] facts stated by the court. He, Mr. C. would answer no. It was the opinion to which the court came from an examination of a mass of facts, and not a statement of the facts themselves. His friend thought that with regard to General Jesup, this court had done nothing not warranted by the circumstances of the case, and not in accordance with the practice of courts martial. Was this so? Was it the practice of courts of inquiry to pass censure on witnesses, called before them, for conduct previous to being summoned. General Jesup was not before this court in any other way than as a witness, and therefore though they had a right to examine and weigh his testimony, and pass upon it, yet they had no right whatever to pass censure on the previous conduct of that officer.

Mr. STRANGE thought it must be apparent that the call made by the Senator from South Carolina could be attended with no good, and probably might result in great mischief. The matter was yet inchoate—was not concluded. When the investigation should have been closed by the proper tribunals, and if it should seem that injustice had been done, it would then be time enough for the National Legislature to act. The gentleman from South Carolina disapproved of the President having published the communication relative to the court of inquiry. Why, if the President had published his decision, and given no reasons for it, there would doubtless have been great complaint made. But he had done no such thing. He did not say that he disapproved of the conduct of General Scott, or that he might be guilty, or not guilty. He merely says: "I do not affirm the decision of the court of inquiry, because they have not given me sufficient evidence to decide upon the case. A court martial is to obtain facts, and I cannot decide whether their judgment is right or wrong until I see the facts." The President says, in express terms, that the court say there was delay; but who caused it did not appear. Neither did the court say what they considered "unnecessary delay." Now, all this [says the President] is necessary to be understood, and, therefore, I refer the matter back to the court, in order that they may give me the information I require. They may be right, or may be wrong, for aught that appears. I leave Gen. Scott as he was before the investigation."

Mr. S. asked whether it could be complained that the President has caused the delay? Not at all. He left the character of the accused precisely as it was. He (Mr. S.) did not think it exactly fair that the gentleman from South Carolina should assail the character of a man (General Jesup) not before the Senate. He thought it ill became gentlemen to find fault with the President for doing desirous to shield the reputation of one citizen, when they were so anxious to shield the reputation of another. It was surely time enough for the court martial to animadvert on the conduct of the other gallant officer when he should be before them; and he must say that the court did step out of their way in doing so, for it was not a matter for their consideration then. So far as General Scott was concerned, Mr. S. thought, that by pursuing the course desired by the gentleman from South Carolina, injury might be done him, rather than good. Believing, therefore, that the call was premature, he would move to lay the resolution on the table. Negatived—ayes 17, nays 23.

Mr. PRESTON contended there was not a shadow of a shade of suspicion that could justly rest on the military character of General Scott. The very men now in Florida were doing precisely as General Scott said they would have to do. They had found themselves reduced to the necessity of doing what his military sagacity foresaw they must do.

Mr. CUTHBERT would make no reply to the Senator from South Carolina, but he would put it to him if the course he was now pursuing would not tend to injure his friend. If General Scott was at Chippewa, was not General Jesup there too? If General Scott was at Bridgewater, was not Jesup also there; and was not his fame as dear to every American bosom as that of General Scott? Mr. C. after a handsome eulogium on the character and services of General Jesup, deprecated unnecessary comparisons as to the relative merits of two gallant officers, and hoped that the matter would be permitted to take the course which wisdom and moderation dictated, without indulging in useless comparisons.

Mr. PRESTON denied that he was making comparisons between the two officers.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that the whole course of the gentleman's remarks appeared to him to have that tendency.

On motion of Mr. RIVES, the resolution was, in the end, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs—ayes 28, nays not counted.

The bill for the settlement of the claims of the executrix of Richard W. Meade, deceased, was taken up, and after some remarks from Mr. CLAYTON, in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to recommend it, with instructions to the committee to strike out the second section, and insert in lieu of it, "that if, in the opinion of the Board, the United States are in law and in equity bound to pay any part of the original claim, they should report the same to Congress at the next session."

Mr. BLACK moved to amend the motion, by making the decision of the Board final, and ordering the immediate payment of such amount as shall be found to be due; and after a debate, this amendment was adopted—ayes 25, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Niles, Preston, Southard, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, and Wall—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clayton, Dana, Davis, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Page, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, and Wright—15.

Mr. HUBBARD then, by general consent, withdrew his motion to recommend, and the substance of the instructions in the motion as amended, on motion of Mr. BLACK, was added to the bill by way of amendment; after which it was passed—ayes 28, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Fulton, Grundy, Kent, King of Georgia, Knight, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Rives, Sevier, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, and Wall—28.

Mr. WRIGHT said he arose to ask a favor of the Senate. It was late, and he knew well the body was already wearied with the labors of the day; but he hoped a compliance with his request would not protract the session materially, or prove a heavy tax upon the patience of the members present. He moved that Senate bill No. 88, entitled "A bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire at the late conflagration in the city of New York," be now taken up, and that the orders of the day, general and special, previous to that bill, be postponed for that purpose. Mr. W. said he would make a single remark, as applicable to his motion. The bill contained a single principle: that of remitting or refunding the duties upon goods burned in the original packages, as imported. To the details of the bill he believed no Senator would find any objection, and he was now desirous to make a few amendments, purely of detail, and let the bill pass informally, if it should be the preference of the Senate, to its engrossment; and, upon the third reading, the principle of the bill might be considered and discussed. He did not propose to bring on that discussion now, and should the Senate gratify him by taking up the bill, he would promise not to occupy its time this evening by debate.

The question was put, and the bill taken up for consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT then moved several amendments, all of which were adopted, and all of which, he said, were offered in pursuance of suggestions made to him by the most respectable committee now in attendance in behalf of the suffering merchants, or by the persons whom it was proposed to constitute commissioners for adjudication upon these claims. These persons were the District Attorney of the United States for the southern district of New York, the Collector of the port of New York, and the Naval Officer of the said port.

The bill, as originally drawn and reported by the committee, required that all the claims should be examined, and the testimony and judgment of the commissioners returned to the Secretary of the Treasury, and acted upon by him before any claim could be paid. The object of the first several amendments he had offered, was to permit the commissioners to return to the Secretary the testimony taken before them, and their decisions upon any one or more of the claims at any time, that the Secretary may act upon them, and permit the certificates to issue, while other claims shall be in the course of investigation.

In addition to these amendments, he had offered two additional sections to the bill. The first of those sections was to extend to such goods as had been partially, but not entirely, destroyed in the original packages, the provisions of the bill, and a relief to the owners of such goods proportioned to the damage and destruction caused by the same conflagration. If the principle of the bill was sound, he could see no reason why that principle should not be extended to these partial sufferers, in proportion to their losses, as well as to those whose property had been totally destroyed; and the section contained an express prohibition against its extension to goods damaged or destroyed after the packages had been broken, and the goods taken therefrom.

The other section, Mr. W. said, was an authority to the commissioners to employ a clerk, who should be paid out of the public Treasury. It had been suggested to him to provide in the bill for payment to the commissioners for their services. These persons were all officers of the Government, and two of them, the collector and naval officer, salary officers; and although the district attorney stood upon a somewhat different footing, he had concluded, after mature reflection, that it was not best to incorporate into this bill any provision for the compensation of any of these officers. It was impossible to say what amount of labor it would impose upon them, or how much of their time would be required in the performance of the duty imposed. Knowing those officers personally as he did, he had the fullest confidence that they would all cheerfully discharge the duties imposed upon them by the bill, and that without any previous provision for compensation beyond that pertaining to their existing offices. When the services shall have been performed, and the labor can be perfectly known, Congress can with certainty in the matter. That these commissioners, however, would require a competent clerk, would be apparent to every one. The claims were numerous, and the proofs might be voluminous. The returns to the Secretary of the Treasury, required by the bill, would require entire copies of many, if not all, the papers before the commissioners, and the issuing of the certificates provided for would require great clerical labor. Hence he had proposed the provision for a clerk.

These amendments having been adopted, Mr. CALHOUN inquired of Mr. WRIGHT, if he could state about the amount of the claims which would be presented under the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT replied that he thanked the Senator from

VOLUME 4.....No. 13.

South Carolina for making the inquiry. It had not been, and was not now, his object to discuss the bill, but the inquiry made it his duty to state that a list of the claims, containing the names of the claimants, and the amount of each claim, had been furnished to the committee, had been by the committee presented to the Senate with their report of the bill, and was now upon the printed files of every Senator. From the statement, it appeared that there were one hundred and thirty-six individuals and firms claiming a return of duties upon goods destroyed in original packages, and that the amount of their claims, in the whole, was $418,747 39. The number and amount of these claims had been thus obtained. Immediately after the fire, a large committee of merchants had been appointed to inquire and ascertain, as far as that could be done, the amount of losses, and the names of the sufferers. At that time a list of the sufferers, supposed to be nearly perfect, was made. In December now last past that committee had made a call, by a publication in the newspapers of the city, upon all persons who had claims for remission of duties upon goods burned to come in, and authenticate their claims, with a view to their presentation to Congress. These one hundred and thirty-six individuals and firms had appeared, and verified their claims by the affidavits of the respective claimants, which affidavits were now before the Senate with the bill under consideration. These were claims exclusively for goods destroyed in original packages as imported, the only class of claims provided for in the bill. In addition to this list, (Mr. W. said) he was informed there was another claim, amounting to about $70,000, which was not now presented to Congress, because the subject of the goods destroyed was in litigation between the city of New York and the owners. These were goods destroyed by blowing up with powder the buildings in which they were stored, to arrest the progress of the fire. The buildings were blown up by the order of the authorities of the city, and the owners of the goods thus destroyed were claiming from the city entire compensation for their losses. They, therefore, could not now come before Congress to ask a remission of duties. The city was resisting these claims against it; and until a decision of the litigation, it could not be known which of the parties would be entitled to the remission. Still he was informed that a claim, to the extent he had named, existed in consequence of the destruction of these goods, and it could not be important to the United States how the litigation should terminate, as neither the amount or character of the claim upon this Government would be thereby altered. This, (Mr. W. said,) would make the amount of these claims about $500,000; between $450,000 and $500,000.

There was another uncertainty as to the amount which he would here mention. Certain individuals and firms, who filed with the committee of merchants claims for remission of duties last year, had not yet appeared in pursuance of the call made in December last to authenticate their claims. He had already stated that 136 individuals and firms had appeared and testified to claims amounting to $418,000, as the duties upon goods destroyed in unbroken packages as imported. In addition to these, 97 individuals and firms had appeared and testified in the same manner to claims amounting to $156,394 57, as the duties paid and payable upon goods destroyed after the packages had been broken and the goods distributed in the shops. No provision was made or proposed for this class of claims. Mr. W. said it was matter of deep regret to him that these claimants could not be relieved, but the Committee on Finance had not believed it safe or wise to extend the principle of the bill to any other than goods destroyed in unbroken packages. In addition to these, there were found upon the list of claimants, prepared immediately after the fire, the names of 32 individuals and firms who had not appeared to authenticate their claims in any manner. From the former list it was ascertained that the amount of claims preferred by these 32 houses was $67,976 42; but as it was impossible to say what portion of the sum was for duties on unbroken, and what on broken, packages, it was not in his power to say how much these claims would add to the amount to be drawn from the public treasury if the bill under consideration should become a law.

Mr. CLAY here suggested adding a proviso to some proper section of the bill, that no more than a given amount of money should be drawn from the Treasury under it, and proposed to fix that amount at $500,000.

Mr. WRIGHT said, if the honorable Senator would make the sum $600,000, as he hoped he would, he would accept the amendment, as proposed.

After some little conversation, Mr. CLAY adopted Mr. WRIGHT's suggestion, and moved the proviso, limiting the amount to $600,000.

Mr. CLAYTON objected to any limitation, and upon taking the vote, the amendment was negatived, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FRIDAY, February 17, 1837.

[The House was engaged this day, and the two succeeding legislative days, on the case of R. M. WHITNEY, for an alleged contempt. The testimony is so voluminous, that we cannot have it copied in time for this number. It will be given in the last number.]

JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PATTON said he had objected yesterday to taking up one of the bills from the Senate, on its first and second reading, under an apprehension that its friends intended then to discuss it. Having ascertained that that was not the case, and as it was only intended that the bill should be referred, he willingly withdrew his objection.

The bill in question was "an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

Objection being made, Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rule, which was agreed to—99 to 33.

The bill was then read twice; and, on motion of Mr. GHOLSON, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WESTERN VOLUNTEERS.

On motion of Mr. GRENELL, the House, by general consent, took up the bill, from the Senate "to make payment and compensation to the militia and volunteers of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, called into service, and discharged before marching;" which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER, on leave, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of the number and designation of passengers who have arrived from foreign countries at each collection district of the United States, during each quarter of the year 1836, according to the returns made to the Secretary of State, in pursuance of the act of March, 1819; which, on motion of Mr. BRIGGS, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

TRIAL OF R. M. WHITNEY.

Mr. WHITNEY was then ordered to be placed at the bar, and, as before, was accompanied by his counsel.

Mr. HAMER being still under examination, and the question recurring upon an interrogatory propounded by Mr. PEYTON, and objected to by Mr. McKEON, the former gentleman modified it, and in that form it was put.

The cross examination of Mr. HAMER was concluded, when Mr. MARTIN and Mr. GILLET severally gave answers to the interrogatories first propounded to Mr. FAIRFIELD, when, on motion,

The House adjourned at half past six.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1837.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, asking for the passage of a law granting pre-emptions to such persons as may have settled on portions of the public lands made fractional by the surveys of Spanish and French grants; referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LINN also presented the petition of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Milwaukee, in said Territory; referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BAYARD presented the memorial of the board of trade of the city of Wilmington, Delaware, praying that New Castle in said State may be made a port of entry; referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KENT presented the memorial of sundry cigar manufacturers of the city of Baltimore, protesting against a repeal of the duty on the article made by them; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. HUBARD presented a petition from George Page; which was referred to a select committee of five to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. LINN presented the muster roll of Captain Stevenson's company of volunteers who served in the Indian war of 1832; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WALKER presented the petition of William Haile, in behalf of himself and others, praying confirmation to a tract of land in Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Territory of Wisconsin, praying for a supply of arms—Mr. B. observing that the Secretary of War had informed him that the arms would be sent.

On motion of Mr. BENTON,

The same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Wm. B. Parker.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which had been referred the petition of Henry J. Pickering, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the Committee on the Library was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry into the propriety of procuring the publication of the public and private laws of the several States.

Mr. WALL offered the following resolution, which lies on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire into the expediency of subscribing to 2,000 copies of an uniform edition of the laws of the United States, to be published by J. Elliot, and not to exceed ten large octavo volumes, to be paid for at the present rates of the public printing.

The bill to remit the duties on goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York, was read the third time, and passed without a division.

Mr. EWING of Ohio, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of the heirs of Major Peter Helfenstein, deceased; which was read twice and referred.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Senate took up the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the claims of Stockton and Stokes. The report concludes with a resolution that the Postmaster General is fully warranted in paying, and ought to pay, the amount awarded to the claimants by the Solicitor of the Treasury.

The report being read, the question on agreeing to the resolution reported by the committee was decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the Senate took up the joint resolution reported by the Library Committee, to authorize the purchase of certain manuscripts of the late Mr. Madison; and, after some remarks from Mr. ROBBINS in its support,

Mr. CALHOUN said that he had listened with pleasure and delight to the venerable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr.

Robbins,) and he coincided in opinion with him that we were indebted to Mr. Madison, at least as much as to any other man, for the form of Government under which we live. Indeed, he might be said to have done more for our institutions than any man now living, or that had gone before him.

A great and efficient aid he was, undoubtedly, in forming the Government. But there was another great act, which would immortalize him in the eye of posterity—the profound and glorious views which he took of our Government in his celebrated Virginia report. In his opinion, that was by far the ablest document that issued from the pen of Mr. Madison—one from which Mr. C. had derived more information, and a profounder insight into our Government, than all the other documents he had perused.

Now, if he understood the object in view, it was in direct opposition to the great and fundamental principles of Mr. Madison himself, an adherence to which, he (Mr. Calhoun) solemnly believed, would give durability to the Government under which we were now living.

He wished at some other time (as he was not prepared at this time) to be heard on the subject, when he would endeavor to satisfy the Senate that, in giving our assent to the appropriation asked for, we should not honor the name of Madison. Mr. C. would postpone what he had to say until the third reading of the resolution; and, in the meantime, Senators would have an opportunity of coming to a full understanding of the subject.

The resolution was then ordered, to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. BLACK, the Senate took up the bill for the adjustment of certain claims to lands under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians.

Mr. BLACK, after some remarks, submitted an amendment, to which Mr. BAYARD proposed an amendment, and after a debate, in which Messrs. BAYARD, BLACK, WALKER, PRESTON, and EWING of Ohio participated,

Mr. EWING of Ohio laid on the table an amendment which he intended to propose on Monday, and moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed till that day.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the sixth instant, with the accompanying documents, on the subject of the present state of our relations with Mexico, report:

That they have given to this subject that serious and deliberate consideration which its importance demands, and which any circumstances calculated to interrupt our friendly relations with the Mexican Republic would necessarily insure. From the documents submitted to the committee, in appears, that ever since the revolution of 1822, which separated Mexico from Spain, and even for some years before, the United States have had repeated causes of just complaint against the Mexican authorities. From time to time, as these insults and injuries have occurred, demands for satisfaction and redress have been made by our successive public Ministers at the city of Mexico; but almost all these demands have hitherto proved unavailing.

It might have been expected that after the date of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between the two Republics on the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, these causes of complaint would have ceased to exist. That treaty so clearly defines the rights and the duties of the respective parties, that it seems almost impossible to misunderstand or to mistake them. The committee, notwithstanding, regret to be compelled to state that all the causes of complaint against Mexico, which have been specially noticed in the correspondence referred to them, have occurred since the conclusion of this treaty.

We forbear from entering into any minute detail of our grievances. The enumeration of each individual case, with its attendant circumstances, even if the committee were in possession of sufficient materials to make such a compilation, is rendered unnecessary, from the view which they have taken of the subject. These cases are all referred to in the document No. 81, entitled "Claims on Mexico," in the letter of instructions from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis, of the 20th of July, 1836, and in the subsequent correspondence between Mr. Ellis and Mr. Monasterio, the acting Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs.

If the Government of the United States were disposed to exact strict and prompt redress from Mexico, your committee might, with justice, recommend an immediate resort to war or to reprimand.

sals. On this subject, however, they give their hearty assent to the following sentiments contained in the message of the President. He says, "the length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, and upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican Minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength, for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation, by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past before we take redress into our own hands."

In affording this opportunity to the Mexican Government, the committee would suggest the propriety of pursuing the form required by the thirty-fourth article of the treaty with Mexico, in all the cases to which it may be applicable. This article provides that, "if (what indeed cannot be expected) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended, shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

After such a demand, should prompt justice be refused by the Mexican Government, we may appeal to all nations, not only for the equity and moderation with which we shall have acted towards a sister Republic, but for the necessity which will then compel us to seek redress for our wrongs, either by actual war, or by reprisals. The subject will then be presented before Congress, at the commencement of the next session, in a clear and distinct form; and the committee cannot doubt but that such measures will be immediately adopted as may be necessary to vindicate the honor of the country, and insure ample reparation to our injured fellow-citizens. They leave the mode and manner of making this demand to the President of the United States.

Before concluding their report, the committee deem it necessary to submit a few remarks upon the conduct of Mr. Gorostiza, the late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Mexican Republic to the United States. In regard to that functionary, they concur fully in opinion with Mr. Forsyth, that he was under the influence of prejudices, which distorted and discolored every object which he saw whilst in this country. On the 15th of October, 1836, he terminated his mission by demanding his passports. And for what reason? Because the President refused to recall the orders which he had issued to the general commanding the forces of the United States in the vicinity of Texas, directing him to pass the frontier, should it be found a necessary measure of self defence; but prohibiting him from pursuing this course, unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the citizens of the United States, or he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually preparing within the Mexican Territory.

A civil war was then raging in Texas. The Texan troops occupied positions between the forces of Mexico and the warlike and restless tribes of Indians along the frontiers of the United States. It was manifest that Mexico could not possibly restrain by force these tribes within her limits, from hostile incursions upon the inhabitants of the United States, as she had engaged to do by the 33d article of the treaty. No matter how strong may have been her inclination, the ability was entirely wanting. Under such circumstances, what became the duty of the President of the United States? If he entertained reasonable apprehensions that these savages meditated an attack from the Mexican territory against the defenceless citizens along our frontier, was he obliged to order our troops to stand upon the line, and wait until the Indians, who know no rule of warfare, but indiscriminate carnage and plunder, should actually invade our territory? To state the proposition, is to answer the question. Under such circumstances, our forces had a right, both by the law of nations, and the great and universal law of self-defence, to take a position in advance of our frontier, in the country inhabited by these savages, for the purpose of preventing and restraining their incursions.

The Sabine is so distant from Washington that it became absolutely necessary to entrust this discretionary power to the commanding general. If the President had not issued such orders in advance, all the evils might have been inflicted before the remedy could have been applied; and in that event, he would have been justly responsible for the murders and devastation which might have been committed by the Mexican Indians on citizens of the United States.

When these discretionary orders were issued to General Gaines, they were immediately communicated to Mr. Gorostiza, in the most frank and friendly spirit. The fullest explanations of the whole proceeding were made to him, and he was over and over again assured that this occupation of the Mexican territory, should it become necessary, would be of a limited, temporary and purely defensive character, and should continue no longer than the danger existed; that the President solemnly disclaimed any intention of occupying the territory beyond the Sabine, with the view of taking possession of it as belonging to the United States; and that this military movement should produce no effect whatever upon the boundary question.

The committee believe that Mr. Gorostiza ought to have been satisfied with these explanations, but they failed to produce any effect upon his mind. Without instructions from his Government, he retired from his mission upon his own responsibility. This was not all. Before he left the United States, he published a pamphlet, containing a portion of his correspondence with our Government, and with his own; from which latter it appears, that whilst engaged upon the business of his special mission here, he was making charges of bad faith against the United States to the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Relations. The committee will not enlarge upon the glaring impropriety of such conduct. The publication of such a pamphlet by a foreign Minister, in the country to which he has been accredited, before taking his departure, can be considered in no other light than as an appeal to the people against the acts of their own Government. It was a gross violation of that diplomatic courtesy which ought ever to be observed between independent nations, and deserves the severest condemnation. This act was still more extraordinary, when we consider that it almost immediately followed the note of Mr. Dickens to him of the 20th October, 1836, assuring him that the President would instruct Mr. Ellis to make such explanations to the Mexican Government of the conduct of that of the United States as he believed would be satisfactory.

The committee regret to learn, from the note of Mr. Ellis to Mr. Forsyth of the 9th December last, that the Mexican Government has publicly approved of the conduct of its Minister whilst in the United States. They trust that a returning sense of justice may induce it to reconsider this determination. They are willing to believe that it never could have been made, had that Government previously received the promised explanation of the President contained in the letter of Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Ellis of the 10th December, 1836, which, unfortunately, did not reach Mexico until after the latter had taken his departure. This letter, with the President's message at the commencement of the present session of Congress, cannot fail to convince the Mexican Government, how much they have been misled by the representations of their Minister.

After a full consideration of all the circumstances, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate concur in opinion with the President of the United States, that another demand ought to be made for the redress of our grievances from the Mexican Government, the mode and manner of which, under the 34th article of the treaty, so far as it may be applicable, are properly confided to his discretion. They cannot doubt, from the justice of our claims, that this demand will result in speedy redress; but should they be disappointed in this reasonable expectation, a state of things will then have occurred which will make it the imperative duty of Congress promptly to consider what further measures may be required by the honor of the nation, and the rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

On motion of Mr. MORRIS, two thousand extra copies of the report were ordered to be printed; after which The Senate adjourned.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the same committee, reported without amendment the bill anticipating the payment of the indemnity due to American citizens under the French and Neapolitan treaties, and moved that the bill be taken up and considered at once.

The examination of witnesses was resumed, and continued until near seven o'clock, when Mr. LANE offered a resolution that R. M. Whitney be discharged from custody.

The previous question having been moved and seconded by the House, the resolution was adopted—ayes 102, noes 70.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, February 21, 1837.

Mr. RIVES said, that in consequence of a misapprehension of the title of the bill, he yesterday voted yea on the bill, authorizing certain internal improvements in Florida. His vote was in the negative, and he wished, with the general consent of the Senate to have it corrected on the journal.

The journal was corrected accordingly.

Mr. HUBBARD presented the credentials of the honorable FRANKLIN PEARCE, elected a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to serve for six years from the 4th of March next.

Mr. DAVIS presented three petitions from sundry citizens of Massachusetts; and

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution directing an inquiry into the expediency of establishing a pension agency in Illinois.

Mr. LYON, on leave, introduced a bill granting five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands in that State, from the 1st January, 1834, to 1st July, 1839, for internal improvements: read twice and referred.

Mr. BUCHANAN gave notice that he would, on Thursday next, ask the Senate to take up and consider the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of our relations with Mexico.

Mr. PRESTON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to extend the experiments on fire-arms, under the resolution of the 21st of January last, to such other improved guns as may be presented to him, when in his judgment the improvement is such as to authorize the experiment.

Mr. TOMLINSON submitted the following resolution, which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the act of May 24, 1823, to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the revolutionary war.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the adjustment of certain claims to reservations of lands under the 14th article of the treaty with the Choctaw Indians;

The bill to provide for the enlistment of boys in the naval service, and to extend the term for the enlistment of seamen;

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Brown, Calhoun, King of Alabama, Knight, Moore, Morris, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Strange, Tomlinson, Wall—15.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the previous orders be postponed, and that the bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports be taken up.

Mr. CLAY observed that there were parts of the bill which ought unquestionably to pass, while there were two or three objects contained in it which ought not, unless Senators desired to violate the compromise act. He wished to know whether the Senator from New York intended that the bill should pass in its present shape?

Mr. WRIGHT said it was impossible for him to answer the question. He could only say that his desire was, that the Senate should take up and act upon the bill, and he would abide by their judgment. He would tell the Senator from Kentucky that he was not instructed to move to strike out any part of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN was understood to say that the time had arrived when it was desirable that Congress should make what reduction they possibly could, so as to bring down the revenue to the wants of the Government.

Mr. WALKER said that he should vote against the motion to take up the bill, because his own was made prior to it, relative to taking up the resolution for the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas. He hoped, therefore, the Senate would indulge him by proceeding to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CALHOUN should be glad if the Senator from New York would give the gentleman from Mississippi an opportunity of having his resolution acted upon. He presumed it would not occupy any length of time.

Mr. WRIGHT would take a refusal to act on this bill now as tantamount to a defeat of the object in view, during the present session, as that was drawing fast to a close, and there might not be time hereafter. He would ask for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CLAY said he should now move, after the declaration of the Senator from New York, to take up the bill. He wanted to see what remained of the policy of protection, and was desirous that the committee should come out, and let the country know what their intention was.

Mr. WEBSTER thought that this very important bill should be taken up. He held that it was an indispensable duty of Congress to reduce the revenue as far as they could without touching the compromise act.

Mr. CALHOUN, from all he had heard relative to the bill, should feel himself constrained to vote for the motion of the Senator from New York. It was late in the session, and if the bill was to be considered at all, no time was to be lost.

Mr. WALKER said that, under all the circumstances of the case, he would consent to withdraw his motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the Legislature of Pennsylvania had passed a resolution instructing their Senators to "oppose the passage of any bill which may have for its object any reduction whatever in the present tariff, as established by the provisions of the act of Congress, passed on the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-three." This instruction had not yet been transmitted to him by the Governor, but he had received a copy of it from a friend at Harrisburg. He presumed that the principle on which the Legislature proceeded was, that it might be dangerous to the interests of the State to touch the compromise, and that one departure from it might lead to another, until at last the protection which it afforded might be altogether withdrawn.

Feeling the most profound respect, as he did, for the Legislature of his own State, still he trusted that he might be permitted to say, had it not been for these instructions, he should have voted to repeal the duty on every article which did not interfere, directly or indirectly, with any of the great interests of the country. In pursuing this course, he should not have supposed that he was violating the spirit and intention of the compromise act. On the contrary, he should have voted thus in order to protect these interests, upon the principle of throwing heavy and useless lumber overboard, in order to protect the valuable portion of the cargo. He bowed with deference, however, to these instructions, and they should be his rule of action. He would therefore vote against reducing or repealing any duty whatever.

Mr. CLAY intimated that he should hardly think the Legislature meant to go so far as the Senator from Pennsylvania had indicated he would go.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he could not but feel much indebted to the Senator from Kentucky for his commentary upon his (Mr. B's) instructions. He should, however, take the liberty of construing them for himself. They were free from all ambiguity. They were clear and explicit.

The question being taken on taking up the bill was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Kent, McKean, Robbins, Sevier, Spence, and Tipton—7.

The bill having been taken up and read through,

Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out twelve articles of a drug kind; which was agreed to without a division.

Mr. SEVIER moved to retain three of the articles stricken from the bill, viz: "Guineine, salts, and calomel." The motion was lost—yeas 13, nays 24.

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out "worsted yarn," upon which there is a duty of 20 per cent; which was, after a few remarks from Messrs. Davis, Wright, Preston, and Grundy, agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS then moved to strike out "olive oil," but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. WALL moved to strike out "porcelain and earthen wares."

Mr. NORVELL demanded the yeas and nays, in order that, as this might be considered a test question, whether the Senate would or would not interfere with the compromise, the opinions of Senators on that subject might be ascertained. They were ordered accordingly.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that the South had a deep interest in the compromise bill, the terms of which were, that all the duties were to be gradually reduced down to the year 1842. According to his calculation at the time, if the imports did not increase, there should be a reduction of two millions annually. He would tell Senators, on all sides, that for no little or paltry consideration, as the reduction of duties to the amount of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, should induce him to give up the advantages which the South had in the compromise bill. And let him tell southern gentlemen, their interests were greatly involved in pursuing this course, and that they would injure themselves if they gave up the strong hold they had upon that bill. The Senators from the southern States would find, before this small bill should be got through, how difficult it was to take off duties.

He remembered that when he first came to Congress, an old and sagacious friend told him that he would see that it was much more difficult to repeal, than to lay on taxes. He (Mr. C.) was astonished at the time, but he had long since found the remark to be strictly correct. He was persuaded that if gentlemen should commit the egregious folly of yielding the advantages they possessed by this compromise bill they would pay for it hereafter.

Gentlemen opposite called upon southern gentlemen to respect the bill. For his own part, he would say that he would not disturb the compromise act. When it passed, he voted for it, as he would have done for any other bill, and in doing so, he did not feel himself governed by any pledge, in case there should be an excess of revenue. I stand here, (concluded Mr. C.) upon the advantages which have been given me. I, for one, will not act in any manner calculated to disturb the advantages which the people of the northern States have now; but I do claim that they shall not disturb the advantages which we shall have hereafter. Going upon that ground, all that I ask is, taking into full consideration the tariff interests, that all duties, which may be deemed desirable of more than 20 per cent. shall be taken off. But duties of less than 20 per cent. (unless some special reason can be assigned to the contrary.) I will vote to repeal. I have taken my position, and I believe it to be perfectly strong, and such as my constituents demand, and, with due deference to other southern Senators, what their constituents would approve.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his hope that, considering the late period of the session at which this bill was taken up for action, and the great want of information in regard to many items, the Senate would leave out every thing that was of a doubtful character. To do so, he thought, would be to pursue the part of wisdom; for they might, in the absence of the requisite information, legislate to the injury of some branch or other of the mercantile or manufacturing community.

Mr. CUTHBERT asked what articles, or what interests, were protected by the Constitution? Interests not in existence. Interests brought into existence by the legislation of Congress. Was not that plain? Let gentlemen, if they could, put their finger upon that part of the Constitution stating that certain interests were to be protected by passing prospective laws and protective duties. No; they could not do this. He would ask, then, whether the imposition of new duties, or the continuation of existing ones, were to be made to operate against the adoption of a particular course, however beneficial it might be deemed? Mr. C. went on to illustrate his position, and then asked, were they to be prevented, because it was necessary to protect a new manufacturing establishment of two, which had sprung up since the compromise bill was passed, from repealing certain duties? Was a single manufacturing establishment to come forward as an insuperable obstacle to doing an act which would benefit the country generally? The great object in view was to bring down the revenue to the legitimate wants of the Government; and, in performing that duty, Senators were not obliged to pay deference to single requests of this sort. He cared not what the Senators from Massachusetts and Kentucky said as to the necessity of not violating the compromise. Nor did he admit all, as the Senators from South Carolina and Tennessee seemed to do, the binding force of the compromise act.

Mr. CALHOUN explained that he had used no such expression as "binding force." Mr. C. had said that he would only take that part which was but fair and honorable to the north, while he at the same time looked forward to the advantages which would arise, and which were decidedly in favor of the south. Therefore it was that he would not disturb the compromise.

After a few words from Messrs. CLAY, CUTHBERT, WALL and NORVELL, the question was taken on striking out, and it was agreed to:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster and White—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Linn, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker and Wright—20.

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out "common salt" from the duties free articles; and after a debate, in which Messrs. BEN-TON, DAVIS, WRIGHT and PRESTON participated,

On motion of Mr. DAVIS,
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, TUESDAY, Feb. 21, 1837.

Some conversation took place in relation to a proposed amendment by Mr. PICKENS of the journal of yesterday's proceedings; which resulted in the motion being disagreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented a letter from the Governor of Massachusetts, in relation to a claim.

Mr. ADAMS moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of calling the States in their order for petitions and memorials: lost.

Mr. HARDIN, on leave, presented a petition for a post route in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. HAYNES made an ineffectual attempt to offer a resolution calling for certain information from one of the Executive Departments.

Mr. VINTON moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of laying on the table an amendment he intended to offer to the land bill from the Senate, whenever that bill should be taken up in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 94, nays 69.

So the House refused to suspend the rule, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. GALBRAITH, Mr. SPEIGHT of North Carolina was excused from further attendance on the select committee on an amendment of the Constitution of the United States; and, on motion of Mr. CRAIG, the CHAIR was authorized to fill up the vacancy.

TEXAS.

The first business in order was the consideration of the following resolutions, reported on Saturday last, by Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the independence of the Government of Texas ought to be recognised.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to provide, in the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, a salary and outfit for such public agent as the President may determine to send to Texas.

Mr. HOWARD said he should feel that it would not be kind or courteous to the other committees of the House, for him to press the consideration of these resolutions at the present time, to the exclusion of reports from all the other committees of the House, when they had been prevented for ten days or two weeks from making their reports; especially as the House had been kind enough to permit the Committee on Foreign Affairs to introduce this report at an unusual hour. He was, therefore, not disposed to press the consideration of this report to-day, with a view that the other committees might have leave to bring in their reports. He would inquire, however, of the CHAIR, if he moved its postponement to Thursday next, whether it would then come up in anticipation of all other reports.

The CHAIR said if the report was postponed to a day certain, on that day it would be first in order, unless there should be an unfinished report on the table.

Mr. HOWARD then moved to postpone the further consideration of the report until Thursday next.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina inquired if that motion was debatable.

The CHAIR replied that it was, but the debate was confined within narrow limits. The merits of the question could not be debated.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said he had been waiting during the whole of the present session for an opportunity to say something on this subject, and had given precedence to other matters, over which he considered this subject, in all its bearings, as the most important which had come before the House at the present session. He presumed that, when the House considered that this report would not have a just participation, considering its superior importance, with the other reports of the House, they would not now postpone it, and give it the go-by. Now that they had it before the House, he asked of the friends of Texas to stand by it, and yield to nothing. He was reluctant to exclude other reports, but he regarded this matter as of the greatest importance, and could not consent that this resolution should be postponed. This report had come in at a very late period of the session, and he did not then wish to see it put off still later, when discussion, and even the consideration of it, would have to give way to other matters.

Mr. HAMER rose to inquire whether this report could not be passed by with the general consent of the House, so that it would come up the first thing to-morrow morning.

The CHAIR said by the general consent of the House, this might be done.

Mr. PICKENS called upon the friends of Texas not to postpone these resolutions for a single day, for he understood it the motion of the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs prevailed, that if there was an unfinished report on the Speaker's table, on that day it would take precedence of these resolutions, and exclude their consideration; and was it not reasonable to suppose there would be such a report undisposed of at this period of the session? A motion to postpone to Thursday, at this period of the session, was an indefinite postponement—certainly not so intended by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—but from the position of the business of the House, at the present time, such must inevitably be the consequence. If they admitted, or permitted it to be postponed, even if it did come up in the morning hour, when the hour of twelve o'clock arrived other business might be called up, and of course this report would be excluded; and he would suggest the propriety, in fact the absolute duty, of every gentleman who was favorable to these resolutions, to keep them in their present situation. He had no objection to proceed to the orders of the day, but he must object to this subject being postponed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio would suggest the propriety of allowing the standing committees to report, and let these resolutions retain their place on the Speaker's table until to-morrow.

Mr. HAMER was perfectly willing to pass the resolutions by to-day, if they would come up on to-morrow morning, but he could not consent to a postponement.

The CHAIR remarked, that if this report was passed by with the general consent of the House, it would be the first report in order on to-morrow morning; and if it was postponed until Thursday, it would be the first report in order on that day, unless some report should then be under discussion and undisposed of.

Mr. HAMER said for that very reason he could not vote for a postponement of this report, as in all human probability some report would come up between this and that time.

Mr. C. ALLAN said as the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs might have some undue influence, he wished to state to the House, that that motion could be considered in no other light than as the motion of an individual member of the House. He felt authorized to state, that the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not concur in that motion. While up he would suggest to the friends of this resolutions, considering the late period of the session, and the great mass of business undisposed, the propriety of making a silent vote upon them, without entering into a discussion of the merits of the resolutions.

Mr. HOWARD remarked that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had held a meeting that morning, at which the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Allan) was not present, and, consequently, he was not apprised of the fact, and that this topic was the subject of conversation in the committee; and the motion he had submitted to the House might be considered as expressive of the feelings of the committee so far as he could present them. It was out of the respect that committee had for the other committees, and of allowing them, by the consent of the House, to bring in their reports, that this motion was made. If, however, this report could be passed over by the general consent of the House, so that the committees might have an opportunity of making their reports, and the gentleman from South Carolina would waive his objections and let the resolutions lie over until to-morrow, the object he had in view would be accomplished, and he would be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. HARD inquired if it would be in order to move to lay the resolutions on the table.

The CHAIR said it would.

Mr. HARD then made that motion.

Mr. BOYD called for the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

Mr. HARD withdrew the motion to lay on the table; and

Mr. INGERSOLL renewed it; whereupon

Mr. BOYD again called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 98, nays 86.

So the motion to lay the resolutions on the table was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky stated that he had voted in the affirmative with the express view of moving a reconsideration of this vote. He believed the majority of that House were the friends of Texas, and of the immediate recognition of its independence, and, under that impression, he moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolutions had been laid on the table.

Mr. MANN of N. Y. said this was a question of very great importance, but he thought it premature, and at variance with the settled policy of this Government; he therefore moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and, on that motion, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Ky. moved a call of the House.

Mr. BOYD called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 78, nays 108.

So the House refused to order the call, and the question recurring upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 90.

So the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMARON of Va. requested leave of the House to record his vote in the negative on this question. He said he was absent from the House when the vote was taken, having to attend the duties of the select committee of which he was chairman. The request of Mr. G. was objected to.

Mr. LEWIS then inquired of the CHAIR if it would be in order to make a motion at that time to take those resolutions from the table?

The CHAIR replied that it would not.

Mr. LEWIS. Would it at any time to-day, sir?

The CHAIR. It would not.

Mr. LEWIS. Would it to-morrow, sir?

The CHAIR. It would.

Mr. LEWIS then expressed an earnest hope that the friends of the independence of Texas would avail themselves of the first opportunity to bring those resolutions again before the House whenever it should be in order to do so. We must force (said Mr. L.) a decision of this question before the adjournment.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th ultimo, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents by which it was accompanied.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20th, 1837.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th ultimo, requesting the President, if, in his judgment, not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to that House copies of the correspondence with the Department of State and with the Peruvian Government, of the late William Tudor, Jr. Consul of the United States, and their political agent in Peru, from the 27th of March, 1824, to the 15th of May, 1827; and, also, the correspondence of the said William Tudor with the Department of State, and with the Government of Brazil, while he was Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, until his decease—has the honor to transmit all the correspondence of Mr. Tudor with the Department of State and with the Peruvian Government, during the period referred to, except such parts as it is thought cannot be communicated compatibly with the public interest, but the Secretary of State has the honor to report to the President that, as the correspondence regarded in the latter part of the resolution referred to is of great length, and is principally contained in two large volumes, from each of which a transcript can be made but by one person at a time, it is impracticable to have a copy of it prepared before the close of the present session of Congress.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Washington, Feb. 16, 1837.

The message having been read, was, on motion of Mr. ADAMS, referred to the same Committee of the Whole, having charge of a bill on the same subject.

Mr. PEYTON then moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of submitting a proposition to summon Reuben M. Whitney before the select committee, to answer a question in relation to the authorship of a certain letter to the President of the Bank at Burlington, Vermont, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered.

The House refused to suspend the rules, the vote being—yeas 80, nays 97.

Mr. PEYTON then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of directing the Speaker to issue a subpoena to Reuben M. Whitney, requiring him to appear at the bar of the House to answer the same question, and also asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 76, nays 12.

So the House again refused to suspend.

[These propositions, and the remarks of the gentlemen in relation to them, will be given at length, when the report of the entire proceedings in Mr. Whitney's case reaches this stage.]

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PATTON in the Chair, on the appropriation bills.

NAVY BILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837."

Mr. JARVIS withdrew his amendment.

On motion of the same gentleman the first section was amended by a small increase in the item for the pay of the officers and seamen of the navy.

Two additional items were also inserted, on Mr. C's motion, viz:

1. For repairing the ship house at Philadelphia $1500.
2. For repairing the naval asylum at Philadelphia $500.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an additional section, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute the residue of the prize money deposited in the Treasury, accruing from the capture of two prizes, by Capt. John Paul Jones, to the persons to whom the same might be respectively due.

After a few suggestions by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, CAMBRELENG, PINKNEY, and PEARCE of Rhode Island, the amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JARVIS, the first section was so amended as to appropriate an item of $72,000 to enable the President of the United States, provided he should deem it necessary, to offer a bounty to promote the enlistment of seamen.

Mr. PINKNEY moved to amend the bill, by adding a clause authorizing the President of the United States to select and purchase a site for a navy yard and depot at Charleston, South Carolina, and proposing an appropriation of $100,000 for the erection of suitable buildings, &c. for building, repairing, refitting, &c. of vessels of war.

Also, a further sum of $50,000 for the construction of a dry dock at said navy yard for the reception and repairs of vessels.

Also an item of $1,500 for the salary of a clerk of the works, and $1,200 for an assistant clerk.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected to the proposed amendment, on the ground that it was out of order; the same proposition being the subject of a special bill, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIR said if that was the case, the amendment was not in order.

Mr. PINKNEY said his amendment was not identical with the bill in question. Mr. P. addressed the committee at great length, in favor of the establishment of a navy yard at Charleston, and the great advantages of that place for the object proposed.

Mr. DAWSON begged leave to say that he had no particular objection to the establishment of a navy yard at Charleston, but he wished to call the attention of the committee to the fact that at the last session of Congress a resolution was passed authorizing the President to appoint a naval commission to make surveys on the southern coasts for the purpose of selecting the most eligible site for a navy yard; and that a report had been made, which he held in his hand, and would ask that it might be read by the Clerk; which report would show that Brunswick, Georgia, was the most suitable situation for such an establishment. When they were about to establish a navy yard, they ought assuredly to seek the most eligible situation.

Mr. D. moved to strike out Charleston and insert "Brunswick, in the State of Georgia."

The debate was further continued by Messrs. MCKEON, CAMBRELENG, PICKENS, (who opposed it only because it was out of order in that bill, and preferring it being brought forward and taken up a distinct substantive proposition,) DAW-

SON, CAMBBELANG, OWENS, ALFORD, HAYNES, PARKER, D. J. PEARCE, BELL, GRAYSON, and ELMORE; when the amendments of Mr. DAWSON and Mr. PINCKNEY were severally disagreed to.

Mr. McKAY adverted to the fact that the harbors in South Carolina and Georgia were directed to be surveyed last year by resolutions, while the two harbors in North Carolina had been entirely overlooked. Mr. McK. accordingly moved an item of fifteen hundred dollars, to defray any additional expense that might be incurred in surveying the two harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, North Carolina: agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island offered an amendment, making an appropriation of $50,000 for the purchase of a site for a naval depot at some suitable point bordering on the Narragansett bay, which was negatived.

Mr. DUNLAP moved an item of $10,000 to purchase a site and build a hospital at Memphis, Tennessee.

Mr. DUNLAP briefly advocated the amendment.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE opposed it, first, on the ground that it proposed no benefit: a mere unfinished building, without necessities, would be of no benefit whatever; it was also out of place in that bill; and the Committee on Commerce was understood to be preparing a more general measure on the subject.

Mr. DUNLAP rejoined, and showed the heavy burden imposed upon the citizens of Memphis for the want of such a building.

The proposed amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JARVIS moved an additional item of $5000 to defray the expense of examining the shoals of George's Bank, for the purpose of determining the proper site for a lighthouse thereon, and also to erect said Light House; which was disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBBELANG inquired if this amendment was in order?

The CHAIR would not decide that it was out of order.

Mr. CAMBBELANG insisted that it was, on the ground of incongruity with the object of the original bill. The latter was for the naval service, the amendment of the gentleman from Maine proposed an object exclusively commercial in its character.

One or two immaterial amendments moved by Mr. JARVIS were agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS then moved to strike from the bill the following clause:

"For completing and equipping the ship of the line Pennsylvania, $400,000."

Mr. JARVIS explained, that if this amendment was agreed to, he intended by the direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to submit an amendment, proposing an equal sum for the purpose of building four sloops of war of the second class. There was no division of opinion in the Committee on Naval Affairs, in relation to this subject; they all concurred that it was better to allow the ship of the line Pennsylvania, to remain in the ship-house, where she would be safe, and on a small expense. To employ the Pennsylvania in the service, would cost three hundred and eighty thousand dollars more annually, than would be necessary to keep four sloops of war employed in the service, which would be much greater advantage to the country than the fitting out this huge vessel, and sending her to the Mediterranean to astonish the natives.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island insisted that this ship had been long enough on the stocks to have all her timbers well seasoned; and the argument of the gentleman went to show that she ought to be launched or destroyed. If what was said of the waters of the Delaware were true, and this ship remained on the stocks much longer, she could never be got off, but would remain instar montis, larger than the Trojan horse, a mere matter of curiosity to those who were gratified at the exhibition of, or had a taste for, naval architecture. He insisted that there was no time better than the present for fitting out this ship, as we had ample means in our power; and it was understood that this would have been ordered by the Executive last year, if hands could have been procured. He warmly opposed the motion to strike out the clause.

Mr. REED contended that the Pennsylvania was in the most proper place she could be in; and if she was launched tomorrow, it would be to the advantage of the Government to give two hundred thousand dollars to have her placed back again in the ship-house. The small sloops of war, he contended, were the best calculated for the protection of our commerce. The merchants were looking for protection, and these kind of vessels were the best calculated for the purpose of giving them protection.

After some further remarks by Messrs. JARVIS, McKIM, REED, and SUTHERLAND, the motion of Mr. JARVIS was agreed to, and the clause was stricken out.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON made some general remarks in relation to the increased appropriations in the present bill, over those for the same branches of the service for last year, and moved a provision that none of the moneys appropriated in this bill, should be applied to the surveying and exploring expedition; which was disagreed to.

Mr. REED moved an amendment appropriating four hundred thousand dollars, in addition to the materials already on hand, to build six vessels of war of not less than ten, nor more than sixteen guns. Mr. R. explained, that the object of having these vessels in our navy was to employ them on the West India station, and coast of Brazil, where depredations were most likely to be committed by pirates. These small vessels were better calculated to navigate these waters than large vessels, and they were the very class of vessels necessary for the protection of our commerce.

Mr. McKIM felt himself under the necessity of opposing the amendment, for he was well convinced that sixteen gun vessels or brigs were an indifferent class. He preferred sloops of war, and moved to strike out 16 gun vessels, and insert sloops of war.

Mr. DUNLAP said, I do not rise at this late hour to detain the committee; my only object in rising, is to let the House and country know our true situation, and how we do business. A few hours since I offered an amendment to this bill, appropriating only ten thousand dollars to the lives of the poor, honest, industrious laboring classes of the country (Mr. Reed) asks you to appropriate the moderate sum of four hundred thousand dollars, to build vessels to protect the commerce of the rich, wealthy merchant, and I doubt not it will pass; by the adoption of this amendment, you say to this world that you will appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars for the protection of the property of the wealthy, while you refuse to appropriate any thing for the protection of the lives of the poor. To such doctrines

I enter my protest. If this is administering justice, God deliver us from any more of it.

Mr. Chairman: since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, I have considered myself a Representative of the whole Union, and when any appropriation has been asked for I only ask myself if my country required it; I never asked if my constituents were to be alone interested in it; I have uniformly voted for them when I believed my common country required them. But now, sir, I tell this committee that, until justice is done my constituents, I will oppose every appropriation for the protection of your merchants' property afloat on the high seas; for your navy yards; for your fortifications, harbors, or for any thing but my country and its honor.

My constituents are not interested to the amount of one cent in your property afloat on the seas, and I say, let it all be destroyed; yes, all before I will vote for one cent to protect it, while you impose the onerous burden on one town (Memphis) in my district, with a population of less than two thousand, to pay annually from two to three thousand dollars for the support and protection, not of their own citizens, but of all the persons in the great valley of the Mississippi, who have been so the great emporium of the west, and on their return home, are left by the steamboats sick and destitute on their wharf. I have asked but justice to be done my constituents; you have refused it. And now, sir, I will mete it out to others as they have done to me and mine. When gentlemen from the North and East have heretofore called on the South and West to build them navy yards to build their vessels in, to build them forts to protect their cities, to improve their harbors, we never faltered in our support to them; we voted, as patriots, for whatever would add to the honor, glory, or protection of our common country; but when we ask only that a house may be built for the reception of the poor, sick, and destitute citizen of the West, we are refused it.

Mr. D. J. PEARCE also opposed the amendment, and the debate was still further continued by Messrs. REED, WISE, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, CAMBBELANG, SUTHERLAND; when it was agreed to—ayes 80, noes 45.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike the following clause from the bill, "for the purchase of a site and the erection of barracks at or near Brooklyn, Long Island, New York, $50,000:" lost.

Mr. GRAYSON moved an item for the survey of May river, Tyzer river, &c. South Carolina: lost.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to strike out the two following clauses: 1. Towards an extension of the hospital building near Brooklyn, New York, for enclosing the grounds, and for all other expenses upon its dependencies, $60,000.

2. For the completion of the present hospital building near Boston, and for all expenses upon its dependencies, $1350.

Mr. D. said he wished to test the sense of the committee upon the principle whether hospitals should be confined to one particular section of the country alone.

The motion was disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBBELANG, the committee then rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House; and

On motion of Mr. BEAUMONT, The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Post Office Department, showing the number of clerks employed in it, with the salaries paid to each: referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. TOMLINSON, and by unanimous consent, the above bills were read the second time and postponed to and made the order of the day for Friday next.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Jonathan Freeman; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. EWING of Illinois, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Catharine Myers; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. WEBSTER, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of Samuel Hicks and Sons; which was twice read, and referred.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate took up the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with certain Indian tribes for the year 1837.

Mr. SEVIER moved to amend the bill by striking out the appropriation for holding treaties with certain Indian tribes, for an exchange of lands with them, and for their removal southwest of the Missouri river; and after a debate, in which Messrs. SEVIER, WHITE, CALHOUN, TIPTON, and LINN took part.

Mr. SEVIER modified his motion so as to provide for the proposed removal of Indians west of the Mississippi river in the southwest of the Missouri.

This amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WHITE the bill was amended by inserting an appropriation of five hundred dollars to reimburse Eleazer Williams for his expenses in coming on from Green Bay to Washington, and remaining here on business connected with his tribe.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Mr. DAVIS moved to take up the bill to authorize the President to cause certain of the public vessels, suitable for the purpose, to cruise upon the coast in the winter season, to relieve distressed navigators, which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Senate took up the bill to establish a port of entry at Jersey City; after which

Mr. DAVIS, with the assent of Mr. WALL, offered an amendment, as a substitute for the bill, altering its details.

Mr. WALKER offered an amendment to establish ports of entry at Vicksburg and Grand Gulf, in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS then moved that the bill be laid on the table, and that the amendments be printed; which was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 1st of February, 1837, transmitting a letter from the Governor of the State of Maine, with sundry resolutions of the Legislature of that State, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the State of Maine has paid to two of her citizens, John and Phineas R. Harford, the sum of one hundred dollars each, as a compensation for losses and expenses incurred by them, in 1831, and now claims to be reimbursed from the Treasury of the United States. The losses were sustained in consequence of a conflict of authority between Maine and the adjoining British province of New Brunswick, arising out of the unsettled question of boundary between the United States and Great Britain. The difficulties which have attended the adjustment of this dispute, and the efforts which have been made to arrive at a happy result, constitute an interesting portion of our political history, and are, therefore, in some degree, familiar to all the branches of the Federal Government. But the nature of the question has been such as to bring it more immediately within the cognizance of another branch of Congress than the House of Representatives, and the committee do not now feel themselves called upon to enter into a general review of its past or present attitude. The peculiar position of the State of Maine is eminently calculated to enlist, as it has enlisted, the warmest sympathy on the part of the Federal Government and her sister States. With a large portion of her territory claimed by a foreign Power, she is called upon to exercise great discretion and forbearance, whilst the negotiation is pending, which, it is hoped, may terminate in the establishment of her just rights. The committee regret not to perceive certain evidences that this hope will be immediately realized, notwithstanding the earnest desire of the Executive to adjust it, as the settlement of this national boundary line is, of course, not less an object of national interest than of local feeling; but, until such an arrangement as ought to be made, can be effected respecting it, prudence requires that all parties to the controversy should abstain from actions that will provoke contention, and thus endanger the tranquillity of the border. It was with this view that there was an understanding between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain that each party should continue in the temporary enjoyment of their respective jurisdictions, until the ultimate decision of their claims. Over what territory this understanding extended, and what particular portions of the disputed ground were then under the State or British authorities respectively, the papers before the committee do not show. Respect for the Legislature of Maine, induces the committee to believe that much knowledge was possessed by them, which is not within the control of the committee, and they are unable to discern the distinct ground upon which the United States are held to be responsible. The uncertainty of the principle upon which the claim rests, shows the propriety of having this, like every other case, involving an expenditure from the National Treasury, submitted to an examination by the committee of Congress, upon a direct claim by the individuals interested. Where a State Legislature imposes its decision, and asks that the money paid by it should be refunded, a committee of the House is placed in the embarrassing condition of reviewing the facts and principles alleged to be settled by the vote of the Legislature, or to sanction the inadmissible pretension for a charge upon the Federal Treasury. There are cases where an expenditure by a State should be promptly and liberally refunded; such, for example, as those in which she steps forward to defend herself from a sudden invasion by an enemy, or to ward off danger from any quarter. Taking upon herself the performance of a duty which the Constitution has devolved upon the Union, it is highly proper that the Union should acknowledge the service; but, even in these cases, the practice of the Government has been to subject the claim to a rigorous scrutiny by the officers of the Federal Government. Should additional evidence be wanted to illustrate a claim undergoing this examination, either by a committee of Congress or a Department, this evidence can be called for, and easily obtained where individuals are petitioners, or States have agents as is often the case, to prosecute their claims. But the committee have already said that they do not see the distinct principle upon which the Government of the United States is thought to have made itself liable, and they are compelled to form an opinion, solely from the papers before them. They, therefore, pray to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The House then on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the bill making appropriation for the naval service for the year 1837.

The question on the amendment to strike out of the bill the appropriation of four hundred thousand dollars, for completing and fitting out the ship of the line Pennsylvania, was taken up separately.

Mr. SUTHERLAND called for the yeas and nays on this amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND addressed the House at some length in opposition to this amendment, going on to point out the superior advantages of fitting out this vessel over the erection of a number of small vessels, which could only serve to bring our navy into discredit. He contended that this vessel should be fitted out and sent abroad, if for no other purpose than to exhibit her to the world. We now had the name of building the finest vessels in the world, and why bring our naval architecture into disrepute by the fitting out these small craft, when we had so splendid a specimen of the skill of our naval architects almost ready to launch. Besides this, the vessel was actually decaying on the stocks more than she would if she were launched and sent to sea. Mr. S. said he had the highest authority for making this assertion, and read a statement of one of our naval officers, who knew the whole history of this vessel, in support of the assertion.

Mr. JARVIS replied to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and stated that this amendment had been introduced by the unanimous consent of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The motion was not his, but it was the motion of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Mr. J. then read extracts from a communication transmitted to that House by the President of the United States at the last session from the Board of Commissioners who had been appointed to examine into this subject, which commissioners reported decidedly in favor of small vessels, as being infinitely better calculated to protect our commerce than ships of the line and large vessels. As to the decay of the Pennsylvania alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. J. had conferred with an officer of the navy on the subject, who was acquainted with the vessel, and that officer had informed him that it was an entire mistake, and that to remove every decayed timber in the vessel, and replace it with live oak would not cost five thousand dollars. The vessel then being safe in the ship house, he considered it of much greater interest to the Government that she should remain there, and that small vessels should be constructed which could navigate every sea, and which would add greatly to the protection of our commerce, especially on the West India station and coast of Brazil.

Mr. J. was proceeding with his remarks, when Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky raised a point of order as to whether it was competent for the House to proceed in doing business without a quorum of members being present.

The CHAIR counted the House, and announced that there were only 106 members in attendance.

Mr. BRIGGS then moved that the House adjourn.

So the House again refused to adjourn; but there was no quorum voting.

Mr. MERCER moved a call of the House, and on that motion called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. MERCER then withdrew the motion.

Mr. HOWARD sent to the Chair a resolution directing a call of the House, and that that call should commence at half past four o'clock precisely.

The CHAIR decided this proposition to be out of order.

Mr. McKAY moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 63, nays 56, as follows:

SECTION 4. Mr. CALHOUN of Kentucky, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of

On motion of Mr. ROWELL, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Michael F. Williams; and the petition ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWELL, also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Jacob Hendrick, James Simmons, David McNair, and others; also on the petition of Israel Ketcham, praying Congress to grant a pension to the orphan children of Thomas Ketcham and Platt Ketcham, late officers of the army; also, on the petitions of James Simmons, Francis Woods, John Peak, E. Pierce, and Hugh McDonald; which reports were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Eleanor Wells, praying to be allowed the amount of pay due to her son, Michael Reed, who was lost on board of the Insurgent frigate in 1802; which was ordered to lie on the table. Also, an unfavorable report on the petition of D. F. Farragut; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. KLINGENSMITH, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Leonard Corl of Pennsylvania, James Wilcock, Joseph Walling, E. Thomas, Isaac Shinn, Josiah Davidson, John Read, John Goodwin, John Cahart, and Elizabeth French; and the petitions severally ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON of Pennsylvania, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Reuben James, Thomas Harrison, James Getchell, and Levi Johnson, and the petitions severally ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JAMES, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Theodore Atkinson, John Schull of Pa. Daniel Woodward, Benjamin Dupey, and others, and the petitions severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims made an unfavorable report on the petition of the heirs of John Wilson; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAYNES moved a suspension of the rule, [objection having been made], for the purpose of submitting the following resolution; which was agreed to—yeas 92, noes not counted.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause the necessary examinations to be made of the sea coast south of the Chesapeake Bay, with regard to the location of additional light-houses, beacons, and buoys, and report the result to Congress at its next session.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of taking up, and referring to their appropriate standing committees, certain bills from the Senate, with the understanding that those which would elicit discussion should be passed over.

Mr. YELL expressed a wish that the land bill from the Senate would also be included; and he moved an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied, that that bill would certainly elicit discussion.

Mr. BOON hoped that no friend of the land bill would suffer that bill to be given the go-by in this way.

Mr. YELL would object to every bill as it came up, till the land bill should be reached.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then withdrew his proposition, and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then passed to the orders of the day.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837" was then resumed.

The question pending was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in their proposed amendment, to strike from the bill the clause appropriating the sum of $400,000 for completing and equipping the ship of the line Pennsylvania.

Mr. JARVIS, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House at some length in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Sutherland) made on yesterday.

The naval committee had concurred unanimously that this appropriation should be struck out, and the reasons why they had come to this determination were, that this vessel was perfectly safe where she was, and the cost of keeping her there was very trifling.

He then entered into a calculation to show that the cost of sailing this vessel would be annually about three hundred and forty thousand dollars, whereas the cost of sailing a sloop of war would not exceed fifty-five thousand dollars annually, so that they would be able to keep six sloops of war in the service for about the same amount of money which it would cost to sail this single vessel; and by the employment of these smaller vessels you put more of your navy officers into active service, instead of these allowing them to remain in total inactivity at home.

These were important considerations, and he hoped the House would view them in that light. The country had no need for these large vessels, except at a time when she was at war with some great nation. If this vessel were launched and fitted out for sea, she would never be able to come into any of the ports south of the Chesapeake, and would always have to go into northern ports, where the harbors were of sufficient depth of water; and this probably might create a jealousy in the minds of southern gentlemen. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had instanced two small vessels of our navy which had been lost at sea, the Hornet and Wasp. It was true the Hornet had foundered, as it was supposed, in a storm at sea; but he would ask the gentleman if he had never heard of a British fleet going into one of the European ports, and the officers of one of the vessels in that fleet boasting that he had sunk the "Constitution;" and it was well known that the Wasp was in that region at the time alluded to, and the probability was that this was the way in which this vessel got to the bottom of the ocean.

As to the capacity of these sloops of war to ride out storms at sea, he need only instance the case of the sloop of war Boston in the Bay of Biscay, in one of the most tremendous storms which perhaps any vessel came through in safety.

In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, charging him and the navy committee with doing nothing, he had only to say, that they had reported many important bills which have not yet received the action of the House. One of which, was a bill regulating the peace establishment of the navy, another was a bill reorganizing the navy department, which bill he much regretted had not been passed, because the operations of that department were not conducted as they should be; he did not say this to make any reflections upon the head of that department, because he believed he conducted the business of the department as well as he could under its present organization.

Another bill undischarged of was the bill regulating navy pensions; another one was the bill regulating privateer pensions; and another one was the bill regulating the pay of pursers in the navy; and this latter bill was of the utmost importance. The object of it was to pay them a specific sum, instead of allowing them to make a fortune of the poor sailors, as they had the opportunity of doing at present. All these bills had been reported by the naval committee, and were in the House undisposed of; yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania had made the grave charge against the naval committee of having done nothing.

Mr. J. continued at some length, to point out the superiority of small vessels of war in time of peace over these of larger ships.

Mr. REED said they then had on the stocks, and launched, eleven ships of the line; six out of these had been launched, and out of these six, there was but one in sailing condition. This was an important consideration, and he hoped gentlemen would view it in a proper light. He had taken some pains to examine into the subject of the deterioration of our vessels in the navy, and he had ascertained that the deterioration of ships, after they were launched was about ten per cent. per annum, and at that rate, if this ship of the line Pennsylvania were launched, her deterioration would be about $70,000 per annum. Was it not better, then, to have her remain on the stocks, where she would be on a very trifling expense, and could be fitted out for service, in case of a war, at very short notice?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said a great deal about modern improvements in naval architecture and all that sort of thing, but he had entirely forgotten that the keeping of large ships of war on land in time of peace was a modern improvement, and a very great improvement too. There they could lie, at an expense merely of keeping a roof over them all ready to be launched whenever their services were required; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania wished to abandon this improvement. Mr. R. hoped, however, it would not be abandoned. Mr. R. had not proposed the building of small sloops in lieu of fitting out the Pennsylvania out of any hostility to the Keystone State; indeed, the Committee on Naval Affairs had never taken that into consideration at all. There was a large vessel of war on the stocks at Boston, and Mr. B. would prefer keeping her there, even if the State of Massachusetts should be some small loser by it. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that these small vessels were the graves of our hardy seamen. Well, to confute that, Mr. R. would only point the gentleman to the Baltimore clippers, which were admitted by every nation to be the finest sea-boats in the world, which vessels were much smaller than the sloops proposed to be built by this amendment. Besides, the most wealthy of our merchants risked their property and their lives in merchantmen much smaller than these sloops. Mr. R.'s constituents, or the people of Massachusetts, had hundreds of these vessels which navigated into every sea with perfect safety. If, however, the House thought proper to appropriate this sum for fitting out this vessel, he had no objection; but he would still desire to have those small vessels for the protection of our commerce in the West Indies and on the South American coast.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island insisted that the Committee on Naval Affairs had stepped aside from their duty in opposing this item. The gentlemen from Maine and Massachusetts had predicated their objection to it on the ground of its novelty, and that distinguished naval officers were opposed to it. Now, who were these? Why had they not been named? The appropriations had been called for by the Navy Department, founded on the reports of responsible officers. Nor was this all: there was a special report from the Secretary of the Navy on the subject, calling for the very item proposed in this bill, to which Mr. P. referred. He was not disposed at once to set aside such evidence and such authority upon irresponsible recommendation, nor to give his assent to the effort making by the Naval Committee to overrule the special recommendations of the Executive, of the Secretary of the Navy, and of the whole Board of Navy Commissioners. Mr. P. then went into an argument to show that it would be little short of a prodigal waste of money to substitute the small vessels proposed by the committee, and adduced the policy of Great Britain in relation to this matter, and that of our own Government for the last few years, as sustaining his position, and opposite to the proposed plan.

Mr. CAMBRELENG could not but say to those gentlemen who professed so much regard for the navy, that they exhibited very little of it, or for the interests of the country generally, by making speeches at this period of the session. He hoped they would take his admonition in good part, but really if they were sincere friends to the navy, they would cease making those long speeches which it had been Mr. C.'s good fortune to hear for the last sixteen years.

Mr. SUTHERLAND entered into a statement in reference to the position of the navy yard at Philadelphia, and certain contemplated improvements there, showing that if this ship should not be launched soon, she would have to rot on the stocks. Mr. S. also quoted the special report, in favor of completing the Pennsylvania of the Secretary of the Navy, and warmly opposed the motion to strike out.

Mr. PARKER drew the attention of the House to the fact that for several years no such force as this had been recommended, and he contended that the launching of this ship was not wanted by the present posture of our affairs, or by any emergency likely to arise. There were four ships of the line already afloat, which were more than were necessary, and he was not disposed to vote away so large a sum of money as $400,000 to launch a ship into the water when she was not required, and where she would be, probably, as liable to decay as on the stocks.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 55.

So the clause was stricken out.

The next amendment of the Committee of the Whole was then taken up, as follows:

"And, also, six vessels of war of not less than ten, nor more than sixteen guns, $400,000, in addition to the materials on hand."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays on concurring with this amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. MANN of New York moved to amend the amendment, so as to strike out "sixteen" guns, and insert "eighteen."

Mr. REED (who moved the amendment in the committee) said he had no objection whatever to Mr. Mann's motion; and it was agreed to without a division.

The question was then taken in concurring with the amendment, as amended, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 47.

So the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The amendment proposing an item of $5,000 for the survey of May river, &c. South Carolina was then taken up; and, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the amount reduced to $1,500, and so amended, it was concurred in.

The amendment for surveying Beaufort and Wilmington harbors was also concurred in.

Mr. DUNLAP renewed the amendment offered by him in the Committee of the Whole, proposing an appropriation of $10,000, for the purchase of a site, and the construction of a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee; which, after some remarks from Mr. D. in support of it, was agreed to 72 to 53.

Mr. JARVIS also renewed the amendment submitted by him in committee as follows: "To defray the expense of examining the shoals of George's Bank, for the purpose of determining the practicability of erecting a light-house upon the same, in aid of the general appropriation for the navy, $5,000; which, after some remarks from Mr. J. in explanation of the object contemplated, was agreed to.

Mr. PINCKNEY then also renewed his amendment for an appropriation for a navy yard, depot, dry dock, &c. at Charleston, South Carolina, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said in the present state of the public business, with only six more days of the session to transact it, he felt compelled to make a motion he very seldom did, and he therefore asked for the previous question.

Mr. PINCKNEY inquired if it was in order to demand the previous question, after the yeas and nays had been ordered on the amendment.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

The House refused to second the demand for the previous question—yeas 63, nays 76.

The question recurring upon Mr. PINCKNEY'S amendment, Mr. DAWSON moved to add also Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, and that the same amount be appropriated, and for the same objects, as for Charleston.

The CHAIR said, that motion would be out of order, because it involved an increase of the amount of money proposed to be appropriated by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAWSON then renewed his amendment in the form submitted by him in committee, viz: substituting "Brunswick" for "Charleston," wherever the latter occurred. Mr. D. drew the attention of the House to the fact of the report of the naval commission sent out, under a resolution of last session, to survey the best site for a southern naval depot, having fixed upon Brunswick for that purpose.

After a few further words from Messrs. PINCKNEY, DAWSON, HAYNES, GRAYSON, and JARVIS, the amendment of Mr. DAWSON was disagreed to; and the question recurring upon that of Mr. PINCKNEY.

Mr. PATTERSON asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered; and after some remarks from Messrs. MANN of New York, PINCKNEY, McKAY, JARVIS, and DAWSON,

Mr. MANN of New York renewed the call for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 95.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. McKIM then moved the previous question.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky appealed to the gentleman to withdraw it, as he wished to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the item of $10,000 for a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee, had been agreed to.

Mr. McKIM said he had withdrawn the motion once, and he must decline doing it again.

The House did not second the demand for the previous question, only 57 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky then made the motion indicated above, and gave as a reason for doing so, that he thought it would come up much more appropriately on what was called the new "harbor bill," when the most eligible points on the western waters might be decided on.

Mr. McKAY understood that Memphis had been, or was intended to be, included in the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The House determined to reconsider the vote—yeas 80, nays 50, and the amendment was then rejected without a division.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to strike from the bill the following clause:

"For the purchase of a site and the erection of barracks at or near Brooklyn, Long Island, New York, $50,000."

Mr. GHOLSON asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island, then rose and said that he had intended to move an appropriation for Narragansett Bay, but he would demand the previous question.

The House seconded the call, yeas 69, nays 56.

Mr. HANNEGAN, referring to the few members present, barely a quorum, moved a call of the House. Lost.

The main question was then ordered without a division, and on the main question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed,

Mr. HANNEGAN asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

Mr. ROBERTSON inquired if a motion to recommit this bill would be in order?

The CHAIR said it would not; the previous question having been moved and seconded, the main question must be first taken.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day, and having been engrossed, and on its third reading,

Mr. ROBERTSON then moved to recommit this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with a view, he said, to reduce the aggregate amount of appropriations in it in such a manner as that committee, upon considering the bill again, might think proper. He added, that he had no disposition to embarrass the appropriations for the expenses of the Government, but he could not omit adverting to the fact of the enormous increase in this branch of the service, and making an effort to resist it. He had been given to understand that the amount of money appropriated in the present bill exceeded that of last year $1,200,000.

Mr. CAMBRELENG concurred in the views of the gentleman from Virginia, in relation to retrenchment, but he did not think that this was the appropriate bill to commence retrenchments upon. He was certainly in favor of retrenchment, but, in the present state of our relations, he did not think it expedient to reduce the appropriations for our navy. The Senate was responsible for a large part of the $1,200,000 alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia. He believed there was much less money spent on this branch of the public service than on others which were less important, and he hoped the bill would not be committed.

Mr. VANDERPOOL, in order, he said, to test the sense of the House on this question, moved the previous question, which was seconded, yeas 87, nays 44; and the main question being ordered,

Mr. GHOLSON asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, the passage of the bill, but they were not ordered, and the bill was passed without a division.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the "bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, &c. for 1837," returned from the Senate with amendments, was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, on the amendments of the Senate to the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837."

Mr. MERCER moved to include the bill providing for the erection of marine hospitals on the western waters; which Mr. CAMBRELENG accepted as a modification.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved to include certain bills extending the pension system to certain western warriors: lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to include the bill providing for the erection of marine hospitals in the different sea ports on the Atlantic frontier: lost.

Mr. THOMAS moved to include the bill to punish certain crimes against the United States in the District of Columbia: lost.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair, on the first two bills.

The committee resumed the consideration of the "army bill."

The amendment pending was an amendment to the Senate's amendment appropriating $50,000 to pay for the equipments of the Kentucky volunteers, who had been called out under the requisition of Gen. Gaines.

Mr. GRAVES withdrew his amendment, allowing three months' full pay as compensation to those troops who had mustered at Athens, and submitted an amendment directing the Secretary of War to allow to the volunteers of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, who had been called out under the requisition of Gen. Gaines, one month's pay, with all their expenses; and making an appropriation of $11,650 for the pay of the rifle corps and Coosa volunteers, who were commanded by Major Holt.

A few explanations by Messrs. GRAVES and WHITT. TLESEY this amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEYTON then moved an amendment appropriating $135,000 or arrears of pay due to the Tennessee volunteers raised on the 10th of December 1812, and discharged on the 10th December, 1813.

Mr. P. addressed the House at some length in support of this amendment, and read various extracts to show the justice of the claim.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island wanted to vote understandingly on this subject, and he wished to know whether the claim came before the House in an authentic form, and whether it had been approved by the Department of War.

Mr. PEYTON explained that the evidence had been laid before the Department, but by accident the paper discharging these troops had been lost, and owing to this the Department would not make the allowance.

Mr. PEARCE could not support this claim unless it came through the regular channel through which all others came; and he apprehended that there must be some mystery in this claim, or it would not have laid over this long without being settled.

Mr. BELL addressed the House at some length in support of the amendment.

Mr. MASON of Ohio, did not think they could entertain the claim at this time, and he would move to lay the bill aside for the present: so the bill was accordingly laid aside for the present by general consent.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

The committee then took up the bill authorizing the purchase of suitable sites for the erection of marine hospitals on the western rivers and lakes.

Mr. McKAY offered an amendment making an appropriation of $10,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Wilmington, North Carolina, and $10,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at New port, Rhode Island.

After some remarks by Messrs. McKAY, PEARCE of Rhode Island, MERCER, and WARDWELL,

Mr. OWENS moved to amend the amendment by appropriating $10,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Savannah, in Georgia.

Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois remarked that he had observed a strict and absolute silence on this subject until the present time. He considered this course, on ordinary occasions, the most wise in order to secure the passage of a measure in which he was so much interested for his constituents. There is no subject in which a most worthy class of citizens is so much interested, and which is so congenial to the humanity which, I have abundant reason to believe, exists in the heart of each member in this House. This measure is not for the wealthy, nor is it for that class of people who live on the fat of the land without work. It is for the bone and sinew of the country, the class of people that support all, and labor for their living.

On many occasions during the last session, his friends in the House will recollect that he urged this subject on their consideration so often, and with so many repeated efforts, that he was fearful that he had almost tired the House on the subject. On this consideration he deemed it his duty to secure the passage of the bill, and to observe a perfect respect for the House, which he had done on all occasions, not to urge the consideration of the measure so often on the House as he had done heretofore. He considered the law so palpably right, that it needed no assistance or explanation whatever to insure its passage. But the course pursued by gentlemen had changed his opinion; and when he saw a measure that is so just and right within itself, and so congenial to his feelings, sinking under a load of extraneous matter, he considered silence no longer to be a virtue, and therefore would appeal to the common sense and justice of the House for the preservation of this desirable measure.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. McCoy) offered an amendment for a hospital at Wilmington, in that State, and to this amendment various other propositions for as many other hospitals as amendments were offered. One in Rhode Island, one in Georgia, one on Lake Ontario or Champlain, and these all urged with talents and some plausibility of reason.

Mr. R. said he would submit to the sound sense and reflection of this House for a decision against all these amendments; if they desired the bill for hospitals on the western waters to pass into a law. If this course were adopted, to name the sites for hospitals in the law, each member would be compelled to urge the location of a hospital in his congressional district. He hoped the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) would see the utter impossibility to succeed in such a course, and abandon his prospects of establishing his hospital in this bill. In fact, that little State, Rhode Island, seemed from the appropriations it had already received from the hands of the Government, to be a great favorite at the city of Washington. He presumed all these appropriations were just and right; but if this were cut off, and these streams from the public corn crib were diverted into another channel, this little State would require the fostering care of physicians to save her life.

It is utterly impossible to locate the sites for hospitals in any bill before Congress. Every member would have a town or site in his Congressional District, that he and his constituents would agree were most excellent places for the welfare of the sick. The gentleman, Mr. Wardwell, of New York would say, and in truth too, that on the shores of Ontario were good sites for hospitals; so would Mr. Owens of Georgia urge it on the consideration of the House, that no place was there more necessary for hospitals than in that State. This principle once established, my friends all around me, who honor me so much with their attention on this occasion, must move for hospitals in their respective districts. The gentleman, Mr. Hannegan, would have one at Logansport in Indiana, and Mr. Ingham one in the State of Connecticut.

This course will at once demonstrate its impracticability, and the inevitable destruction of the bill now before the House.

Mr. R. said, he had himself once pursued this policy, to name the site for a hospital in a bill, and on full knowledge and experience of the subject had abandoned it for ever. He did not hesitate to say, and he said it because he knew it, that at or near the mouth of the Ohio river, was the most eligible point in all the West, for the location of one hospital. This site is the most centre of any place in the valley of the Mississippi, in navigating the rivers of that vast region of country.

All the great rivers of the west, some of whose waters are densely populated, and others fast settling and improving, concentrate to this point. It is a point between the upper and lower Mississippi, and convenient by water to an immense region of country.

Yet with all these advantages to the people for a hospital at this point, and after repeated efforts, he had abandoned the location of a hospital in the bill at it.

The situation at or near the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi, will claim the attention of the persons named in the law to make the selections, and no doubt there will be established one at this suitable point.

He would also state to the House that commissioners, talented medical men, would be more capable to make the selections than members of Congress, who, perhaps, had many of them never seen the "Far West" at all. The commissioners would examine with care and attention the various suitable places on "the western waters" for hospitals, and thereby make the selections with a view to the general welfare of the country, and not the particular advantage of any congressional district, as members of Congress would be compelled to do.

The gentlemen of the army, mentioned in the bill, he would not prefer to citizens, to make the selections of sites; but a majority of the Committee of Roads and Canals, of which he was a member, preferred them to citizens; and for the sake of unanimity in the committee, and to secure the passage of the bill, he would not propose an amendment to change the commissioners.

One other consideration he would present to the House, and then conclude his remarks. It was the great expenditures of the public money in one section of the country, and not much in another. This must be done, to a great extent, from the necessity of the case. Fortifications, light-houses, and such improvements, must be made on the frontier and on the ocean. A light-house in the interior, and off navigable water, would be of no use at all to the public. The same may be said of fortifications, and such improvements that must be made in a certain part of the Union. It is on this principle we of the West act. We have voted millions for these Atlantic improvements, and for the support of the navy.

Twenty five millions of dollars, received into the Treasury from the sales of the public lands of the West, have the most of it been expended in State improvements on the sea board. In this we are compelled to accede; and now, when we of the new States and of "the Far West" want a small pittance, a mere drop in the bucket, only fifteen thousand dollars, to enable certain officers of the army to purchase sites for hospitals on the western waters, our proposition is amended to death, weighted down with other hospitals on the Atlantic shores, and from the very section of country where all the treasure almost of the United States is disbursed and expended. This seemed to him (Mr. R.) so manifestly unjust and wrong, that he supposed gentlemen would abandon the amendments. He hoped his talented friend from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) would cease his operations for a hospital in this bill, and use his excellent talents and singular voice on other occasions.

Mr. R. remarked further, that a system of hospitals suitable to the inland navigation of the country would not be adapted to the sea board. The mode of navigation was, from the nature of the country, different, and the systems could not be alike, and ought not to be in the same law.

He would conclude by saying, that the poor and friendless, and the country in general are under great obligations to his friend, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Mercer) for bringing this subject before the House, and sustaining it with his influence and talents.

He hoped the amendments would not be agreed to, and the bill passed.

After some remarks by Messrs. OWENS, DUNLAP, PEARCE of Rhode Island, BOND, REED, DENNY, GRANGER, GRAVES, PARKER, HARPER, MCKAY, CALHOUN of Kentucky, the amendments of Mr. OWENS, and Mr. MCKAY, were severally disagreed to.

Mr. PARKER moved an amendment increasing the appropriation in the bill to $30,000, for the purpose of purchasing sites or six hospitals at suitable sites on the Atlantic coast and western rivers and lakes; which was disagreed to.

Mr. DUNLAP then moved an amendment appropriating $10,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee; which was disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. LANE, the committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER, having resumed the Chair, the amendments to the bill were concurred in; when

Mr. PATTON moved to strike out the enacting clause to the bill.

Mr. P. then proceeded to address the House at some length in opposition to the general principles of the bill, and concluded by calling for the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. HANNEGAN said, for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on this bill, he would move the previous question; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. MERCER, who made some remarks in reply to his colleague, (Mr. Patton,) and concluded by moving the previous question, which was seconded by the House; and the main question being ordered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD,

The House adjourned at half past 7 o'clock.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 24, 1837.

The CHAIR presented a memorial from a meeting of the directors of the Bank of the United States, setting forth that they have seen a report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, in which he laments that he has not been able to settle with the bank, and stating their perfect readiness to settle with the Government on terms mentioned in the memorial, and pay over the amount that may be due, reserving to the bank the dividends due the Government on its stock, until a judicial decision is had as to the damages claimed by them on the draft on the French Government: referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Catharine Myer; reported the same without amendment.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON,

The Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Peter Gibson and Michael Quin.

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made a report on the petition of Lieutenant Alexander of the United States army, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. NORVELL in pursuance of notice given yesterday, asked and obtained leave, and introduced a bill to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate the boundary line between the State of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, and by unanimous consent, the bill was then read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837, was read twice and referred.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill giving effect to the eighth article of the treaty of 1819, between the United States and Spain.

The bill to organize the several fire companies in the District of Columbia.

The bill to continue in force the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the State of Missouri, approved 19th July, 1832, and the act supplementary thereto, approved 21 March, 1833.

The bill to authorize the erection of a hospital in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The bill to amend the charter of the Franklin Fire Insurance company.

The bill to amend the act for quieting possessions, enrolling conveyances, and securing the estates of purchasers in the District of Columbia, passed May, 1832; and

The bill to incorporate the President and Directors of the Fireman's Insurance Company of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions was taken up, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate took up the bill to confirm certain official acts of John Pope, late Governor of Arkansas, and the same having been considered as in Committee of the Whole, and amended, on motion of WALKER, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the Senate took up the bill to create a port of entry at Jersey city.

Mr. WALKER moved to amend the bill, by creating ports of entry at Vicksburg and Grand Gulf, in the State of Mississippi, and supported the motion with some remarks, showing the importance and necessity of the amendment to the great and growing commercial interests of these two places.

After some remarks from Mr. DAVIS, the motion was lost without a division, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to provide for the legal adjudication and settlement of claims to lands derived from the grants to the Marquis de Maison Rouge, Baron Bastross and others, in Louisiana, and Elisha Williams and Gabriel Winter, in Arkansas, was taken up; and after being amended, on motion of Mr. SEVIER, by "inserting the heirs and legal representatives of Carlos de Villemont," the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The Senate then took up the bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports—the question being on the motion of Mr. DAVIS to strike out from the list of articles to be made duty free "common salt."

After some remarks from Messrs DAVIS and BENTON, the question was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Knight, McKean, Nicholas, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, and Webster—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Walker, White and Wright—28.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill, by inserting among the duty free articles, Indian blankets (particularly described in the amendments,) and straw, scarlet cloths, molleskins, and swanskins, (coarse cloths used in the Indian trade.)

After a brief explanation from Mr. BENTON, this amendment was adopted.

Mr. NILES moved to amend the bill, by reducing the duty on coal, from the 30th of December next, to one dollar per ton, and from and after the 30th December, 1838, to 60 cents per ton; and supported the motion with an argument of some length.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied at length in opposition to the motion; and

After some remarks from Messrs. BENTON, NILES, WEBSTER, PRESTON, and BUCHANAN, Mr. CLAY moved that the Senate adjourn, which motion was rejected—yeas 10, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Knight, Preston, Southard, Swift, Tipton—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Kent, King, of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Prentiss, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster White, and Wright—33.

The question was then taken on Mr. NILES'S motion, and it was rejected—yeas 15, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Page, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Tipton, and Walker—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Nicholas, Norvell, Parker, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, and Wright—20.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to strike out "bailey" from the list of free articles; which motion was agreed to—yeas 22, nays 15.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out "cigars" from the free articles; which motion was agreed to—yeas 21, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, and White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and Wright—18.

Mr. NILES moved to strike out "common tin and japanned saddlery;" which was lost without a division.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to strike out palm leaf brooms; which was lost without a division.

Mr. KNIGHT moved to strike out "button moulds;" lost—yeas 16, nays 19.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to strike out "all spirits made from vinous materials."

Mr. WRIGHT opposed the motion; and on taking the question, it was decided in the negative—yeas 17, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Crittenden, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, and White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Ala. King of Ga. Linn, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and Wright—21.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out "all wines and," leaving the word "spirits;" &c.

Mr. NORVELL asked what the object of the gentleman was in making the motion.

Mr. KENT'S reply was totally inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. SOUTHARD remarked that the duty on wines was a strong arm to be used against a powerful foreign nation with whom we had great commercial intercourse, to prevent her from imposing unequal restrictions on our commerce. By repealing the duty, we should render ourselves powerless.

Mr. NORVELL said that when it should become necessary to use this strong arm against a powerful foreign nation, then it would be time enough; but until that necessity arose, he did not see the use of doing so.

The question was taken on Mr. KENT'S motion, and it was lost—yeas 13, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Crittenden, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Morris, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, and Tomlinson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Preston, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, and Wright—26.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the question was first taken on concurring with the amendment made in committee, striking out china ware, porcelain, &c. and decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Linn, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, and Walker—19.

The question came up on concurring with the amendment on motion of Mr. BENTON, inserting Indian blankets and Indian goods.

Mr. BENTON and Mr. LINN advocated the adoption of the amendment, on the ground that the Indians must have what was called the Mackinaw blanket, manufactured in England, cost what it might, for it was strong and durable, and impervious to the weather, and a much better article than was manufactured in this country.

Mr. NORVELL remarked that the duties on Mackinaw blankets had the effect of injuring those who were engaged in that trade in hats, caps, &c. and those who wished to encourage them should be the first to be in favor of taking off the duty. He hoped the motion would prevail.

The amendment was then concurred in—yeas 23, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, Kent, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strang, Walker, Wall, and White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Knight, Robbins, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, and Wright—14.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment to strike out olive oil, and the question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Lyon, Niles, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Walker, and Wall—17.

Mr. WEBSTER remarked that the duty on this article was but small, and was scarcely worth striking out.

Mr. NORVELL said that the item was small, and he therefore hoped that the Senator from Massachusetts would be gratified in not having the article stricken out.

Mr. KENT moved to strike out "calomel, quinine, and Epsom salts; which was rejected.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Crittenden, Davis, Hendricks, Kent, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Swift, Tipton, and Wall—11. The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FRIDAY, February 24, 1837.

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the "bill granting right of way over the public lands to a company incorporated by Alabama to construct a railroad from Tennessee river to Mobile bay, and to grant a certain quantity of land to said company," and that the same be recommitted to the former committee; which was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which had been referred the message of the President of the United States of the 8th of February, made the following report thereon:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 8th of February, relative to Mexico, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully offer the following report: The history of the relations between the United States and Mexico exhibits an unbroken succession of good feelings, and, as far as the occasion permitted, of kind offices, on the part of the American Government, following out, in this as in other respects, the disposition and wishes of the people. The first to recognise Mexico as an independent Power, the Government of the United States has been among the first in the unceasing manifestation of friendship to this adjacent North American Government. At an early period of her struggle for independence, the ports of the United States were open to her flag, even at the hazard of incurring responsibility for this act of impartial neutrality.

But the committee perceive, with profound regret, that on the part of Mexico there has been a long train of injuries to the property of American citizens, and insults to the national flag, for which redress, though often promised, has seldom been obtained.

This omission has doubtless proceeded, in a great measure, from the unsettled condition of the Mexican Government, the numerous and radical changes in which have prevented a fixed policy from being pursued in its foreign affairs. But the committee believe that it has also sprung, in part, from a knowledge of the form of our Government, and the limited powers of its Executive branch.

Cases might be mentioned in which a demand for redress, when made by nations whose Executive had the power of declaring war, and consequently the subordinate power of giving large discretionary authority to its naval officers, has been promptly met when the consequences of refusal were uncertain. But our Constitution has wisely placed the war making power in the legislative branch of the Government, and no severe measures are likely to be adopted towards any foreign Power, unless upon much deliberation and repeated aggression. It would seem to follow from this, however, that in proportion to the slowness should be the firmness of the voice of the nation, when expressed through all the departments of its Government.

Those nations which permit themselves to disregard the remonstrances of the President, when conveyed through agents appointed by him, and rely for their security upon the limited powers which our Constitution has entrusted to that officer, must be taught that his complaints against injury and outrage do but speak, in anticipation, the voice of the entire people of the country.

It may be that, without reference to the limited powers of the President, the Government of Mexico has been encouraged to persevere in its course of aggression by the general absence from its neighborhood of vessels of war belonging to the United States, the interposition of which might have been more effectual than a diplomatic note.

To illustrate this position, the committee will select, out of the many cases of serious and flagrant injury inflicted upon the commerce and rights of the United States, by officers of the Mexican Republic, one of the very few in which that Government listened to our demand for satisfaction.

On the 3d of May, 1836, the United States schooner Jefferson anchored off the port of Tampico, direct from Pensacola, having been sent out by order of Commodore Dallas. Licut. Osborn, and his boat's crew, who went on shore, were seized and imprisoned, and the vessel prohibited from entering the river. A demand for satisfaction made by the American consul was haughtily refused. The Jefferson left the port, but communicated with the sloop of war Grampus, of eighteen guns, which came to off the bar; and on the following day there arrived another American corvette, and both anchored there.

The commander of the Grampus directed a note to the principal of the port, informing him that by order of the chief of the division on the West India station, he had come to enter into a correspondence with him relative to the insult which he had inflicted on the American flag. A note followed from the foreign department of the Mexican Government to Mr. Ellis, requesting him to interpose his authority, and order the vessels to retire. Mr. Ellis very properly declined to do so. In a few days an official communication apprised Mr. Ellis that the Mexican Government had supplanted the officer in command at Tampico, "by substituting in his stead a chief who, it flatters itself, will know how to preserve greater harmony with the agents and subjects of foreign nations;" and announced that "a summary investigation had been ordered to be instituted, which by putting in its true light the conduct of Mr. Gomez, would apply to him the punishment he deserved, if he should prove culpable, as well as to all others who may have taken any part in the affair treated upon," renewing the request that Mr. Ellis would then give his orders for the withdrawal of the squadron from before Tampico, which was done, and the vessels departed. The committee would be pleased if they could stop here in the narrative, but they are compelled to remark that, shortly afterwards, the individual whose punishment was thus promised, as an atonement for the insult to the American flag, was recalled into service, and assigned to a command upon the coast, where his hostile feelings might again endanger the security of American citizens or property.

The effect of this open withdrawal of the apology yielded to the American Government was, as might have been anticipated, soon made to appear in fresh outrages upon some American citizens, who were entitled to have been treated with peculiar forbearance, not only because they were in the employment of the American Government, but because they constituted a part of the crew of one of the national vessels, whose services on board might have been very essential. The arrest and imprisonment of eight of the seamen belonging to the sloop of war Natchez will not now be made the subject of comment, further than to remark, that the prevention of the American consul from visiting them, whilst sick and in prison, from the 4th to the 19th of November, was an act of unpardonable inhumanity, and appears to have proceeded from the same officer whose fictitious punishment, but real promotion, had been offered as an atonement for a previous insult to the American flag.

Looking through the catalogue of complaints which the United States have to make against Mexico, on their own account, as the party whose dignity and honor are assailed, the committee are unable to perceive any proof of a desire on the part of the Mexican Government to repair injury or satisfy honor.

The merchant vessels of the United States have been fired into, her citizens attacked and even put to death, and her ships of war treated with disrespect when paying a friendly visit to a port where they had a right to expect hospitality. It was the inattention of the Mexican Government to complaints of this description, that appears chiefly to have induced the return of the late Charge des Affaires; for in his note of December 7th, he says: "If those (the claims) that might be presented should be all acknowledged as just, yet so long as the several cases of unprovoked and inexcusable outrage inflicted on the officers and flag of his country, which have been heretofore submitted to the Mexican Executive, remained unsatisfactorily answered, he would have but one course to pursue."

It is possible that the claims for private property, which had recently been presented anew to their notice, may have attracted the serious attention of that Government; but if a cordial disposition was felt to adjust them, it is not easy to imagine why those cases, where a decree of the Mexican authorities had been for a long time passed for their payment, and a portion actually paid, were not fully satisfied. The committee are willing to hope, however, that the manifestation of serious discontent on the part of the United States, by the withdrawal of their official representative, will induce the Mexican Government to engage in the active investigation of all the grounds of complaint, pressed upon them for many years past. They fully concur with the President, that ample cause exists for taking redress into our own hands, and believe that we should be justified, in the opinion of other nations, for taking such a step. But they are willing to try the experiment of another demand, made in the most solemn form, upon the justice of the Mexican Government, before any further proceedings are adopted. It is their opinion that a diplomatic functionary of the highest grade should be appointed to bear this last appeal, whose rank would indicate at once the importance of his mission, and the respect in which the Government to which he is accredited is held; for notwithstanding the causeless ill feeling which appears to prevail in Mexico towards the Government and people of the United States, the latter will continue as long as possible, to treat with respect their ancient, though now estranged friend. In conclusion the committee respectfully submit to the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the indignities offered to the American flag and injuries committed upon the persons and property of American citizens, by officers of the Mexican Government, and the refusal or neglect of that Government to make suitable atonement, would justify the Congress of the United States in taking measures to obtain immediate redress, by the exercise of its own power.

Resolved, That, as an evidence of the desire of the American Government to preserve peaceful relations with the Government of Mexico, as long as the same may be compatible with that dignity which it is due to the people of the United States to preserve unimpaired, the President be, and is hereby, respectfully requested, to make another solemn demand, in the most impressive form, upon the Government of Mexico, for redress of the grievances which have heretofore been ineffectually presented to its notice.

The report having been read, Mr. HOWARD said it was the desire of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that the House should have an opportunity of voting on the two resolutions with which the above report concluded, and he wished to move the postponement of their consideration to a certain day, if that could be done without their losing their priority. He proposed, therefore, with the concurrence of the House, that, in a day or two, by the time the report and resolutions could be printed, the subject should be taken up, and he hoped it would meet the concurrence of the House to make them the special order for some day, for in no other way could the House be secure that they would be taken up at all.

Mr. H. did not believe, he added, that much, if any, difference of opinion would be found to prevail in the House upon the ultimate adoption of these resolutions; but whatever the opinion of the House might be, it was proper that it should be expressed, for it was a matter peculiarly demanding that expression. The time of the session being so very short, he reiterated the hope that the subject would be made the special order for some day close at hand, but yet distant enough to allow time for them and the report to be printed.

Mr. H. would name Tuesday next, if by that motion he could secure their coming up as the first business in the morning, and he inquired of the Chair if that motion would secure his object.

The CHAIR stated that if it were under the special order for Tuesday, it would not come up during the morning hour. The gentleman, however, could attain his object by a simple motion to postpone the subject till Tuesday, when it would come up on that day, the first business as soon as the journal was read unless some other report made in the mean time should intervene.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it must be evident to every gentleman that a debate on the subject of Texas would necessarily come up on the civil and diplomatic bill, where an amendment would be proposed for the salary and outfit of a minister to that country. It was also Mr. C's intention, with the assent of the House, on disposing of two other bills, to call up that bill, and he therefore hoped gentlemen would postpone the discussion of this subject till then. Let them go on with the public business in the meantime, for they all knew that on the last day of the session they could do nothing in the way of original action on bills under the orders of the House.

With regard to the resolutions of the gentleman from Maryland, it was no doubt intended, and it was desirable, to get as much unanimity upon them as possible, and he therefore trusted the debate would be confined, in the first instance at least, to the proposed amendment to the appropriation bill. These resolutions might be left to the last day of the session, when they would be taken up as a matter of course.

Mr. HOWARD, in reply, reminded the gentleman that these resolutions had no connection whatever with the affairs of Texas, and he hoped they would not be drawn in conjunction with that subject at all. They had been kept disconnected from the committee, nor was even the word Texas once mentioned in the report; but our grievances upon Mexico were placed upon other and distant grounds; and whenever the resolutions came up, he trusted that the subject of Texas would not be involved with that of Mexico. Mr. H. was willing to adopt any course that might be deemed most convenient by the House, and he would therefore move to make the subject the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rejoined. The House had Friday, (this day) Saturday Monday, and Tuesday, which was all the time left for the passage of the appropriation bills; and under these circumstances, he thought the gentleman ought not to press his motion, or to desire its adoption. On Tuesday night at 12 o'clock they would be precluded from sending any bills from the House to the Senate, and they had, consequently, but four days remaining to dispose of the whole of the public business, including all the appropriation bills. Even to-day and to-morrow they were obliged to set aside all the private business, to consider that of a public character. He earnestly hoped nothing would interpose between the necessary and indispensable business of the country.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Mr. HOWARD, on the effect of his other motion, Mr. H. moved that the report be printed, and, with the resolutions, lie on the Speaker's table as an unfinished report.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he would not undertake to say that there was any manner of connection between this proposed course of the Government of the United States in regard to that of Mexico and that which related to our connection with Texas; but he had the honor, some days ago, to lay on the table a resolution calling for information from the Executive Department of any communications that may have passed between the President of the United States and General Santa Anna. Now, Mr. R. did apprehend that it might be of great importance to the Congress of the United States, the war making power, to know, if any thing had transpired, what had transpired between the President of the United States and the constituted authority, as he (Mr. R.) presumed he was, of the Mexican Republic. They did not know but that General Santa Anna, if he were really at the head of the Mexican Government, and should remain, so in gratitude for his reception by the President of the United States, might be disposed to render the most perfect justice in regard to the grievances against that country; and if he succeeded, as seemed probable, in again attaining the office of Executive of Mexico, we might indulge the reasonable expectation that the friendly relations between the two countries would be amicably restored, and our grievances fully redressed. With that view, Mr. R. appealed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to know from him if they might hope to receive any communication of what had transpired, if any thing had transpired, between General Santa Anna and the President of the United States. Such a communication might have a very important bearing upon the subject then before the House, and he thought it would. With reference to the report and resolutions before the House, he had no objection to consider them at as early a day as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, or the House, might desire, but he asked that they might first be put in possession of the information called for by his resolution, of any communications, if any there had been, between the Executive of the United States and General Santa Anna.

Mr. R. would make one other remark. Many of the complaints against the Mexican Government had originated under the administration of General Santa Anna, at least so he apprehended; and there was thence greater reason to hope that our relations with Mexico might continue to remain pacific.

Mr. HOWARD did not wish the House to engage in a lengthy debate, and he therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the report and resolutions till to-morrow; which was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the Senate bill, entitled "An act to repeal a certain proviso to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, approved 14th July, 1832;" which was agreed to.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, Mr. INGERSOLL reported the bill back with an amendment, "suspending" the proviso referred, instead of "repealing" it; and the amendment having been concurred in, the bill was passed.

HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back to the House the harbor bill, with sundry amendments; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to suspend the operation of the second proviso of the third section of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1835; which, on his motion, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported Senate bill, without amendment, for the relief of George W. Brant, a Cherokee Indian; which was committed.

Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported, without amendment, Senate bill for the relief of Captain Samuel Warren; which was committed.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, with sundry amendments, a bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to amend an act respecting the judicial system of the United States;" which was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. CRAIG, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John H. Smith; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WHITLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of L. Bissell, William Shaw, Conrad House, David Wilkinson, and James Wilkinson; which were severally ordered to lie on the table, and be printed. Also, on the petition of Thomas Beall, for herse lost in the service of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. STORER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported unfavorably on the petitions of Edward Kearney and Andrew Cole; which reports were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WHITLESEY of Ohio, from the same committee, to which this subject had been referred, reported the following resolutions, which were concurred in.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the claim of Meshach Hale, as relates to the loss of a horse, and that the same be referred to the Third Auditor for settlement under existing laws.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the claim as relates to the loss of a gun; and that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. CHAPIN, from the Committee on the Revolutionary Claims, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Nathaniel Bird, and that the same do lie on the table; agreed to.

Mr. CHAPIN offered the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill with suitable provisions to prohibit the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and all others within the jurisdiction of the said District, under adequate penalties, from carrying about their persons concealed and deadly weapons.

Mr. CAMBRELENG objected to the consideration of the resolution, because the whole day would be consumed in debate upon it, and the House could not now spare the time for the discussion.

Mr. CHAPIN said he did not wish to debate the resolution; he merely wanted a distinct expression of the sense of the House upon the subject matter, without debate. He, therefore, moved suspension of the rules in order to consider the resolution.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said debate could not be avoided if the resolution came before the House.

Mr. INGHAM called for the yeas and nays upon the motion, which were not ordered.

The question being taken, the House refused to suspend the rules, it requiring a vote of two thirds; so the resolution was not considered.

Mr. VINTON laid on the table an amendment to the land bill, which he gave notice he should move when that bill came up for consideration; and the same was ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWENS, on leave, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House at the next session of Congress, all papers and documents, and all and every matter connected with the frauds alleged to have been committed upon the Creek Indians, in the sale and purchase of their lands; and, more particularly, the evidence on the subject collected by the commissioners appointed by him to examine and report on the same, as, also, the circumstances and facts attending the sale of lands by the Creek Indians to certain individuals in Georgia, Alabama, and elsewhere, alleged to have been made by, and under, the authority or sanction of General Jesup, of the United States army.

Mr. CHAPMAN proposed the following amendment: "and also in relation to reservations allotted to Indian heads of families who have died since their location."

Mr. OWENS accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolution, and, so modified, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. BOON, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, on the subject of a reduction of the revenue.

Mr. MERCER moved that the House take up the Senate bills on the Speaker's table for commitment; which was agreed to.

The Senate bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, being read the first time.

Mr. GHOLSON moved that the bill be passed over, so that it might remain in its present situation on the Speaker's table.

After various suggestions by Messrs. MERCER, HARDIN, SUTHERLAND, BELL, and LANE, as to the proper course of proceeding in relation to this bill,

Mr. MERCER moved a reconsideration of his motion, which was agreed to, and the bill was permitted to remain on the Speaker's table, in the same situation in which it had been before.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH in the chair, on the amendments of the Senate to "the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837."

The amendment pending was an amendment of Mr. PEYTON, making an appropriation of $150,000 for arrears of pay due to the Tennessee volunteers raised on the 10th of December, 1812, and discharged on the 10th December, 1813.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed the hope that the gentleman from Tennessee might not press this amendment at the present time, when they had but a few days left to get through with the annual appropriation bills, but that he would leave it for the consideration of Congress when it should have more time to make inquiries into the subject.

Mr. WHITLESEY of Ohio concurred in opinion with the gentleman from New York. He thought they ought to have more time to consider this claim. The Committee of Claims, having had the subject under consideration; had agreed that the claim should lie over for some time, so that there might be an opportunity of laying before them the necessary evidence in the case; the paper discharging the troops might perhaps yet be found, and then the claim would come before the house properly authenticated.

Mr. BELL went into an explanation of the claim at some length. The troops were to be sure discharged, but they were afterwards called into service and served out their full term of twelve months, and consequently were entitled to pay.

Mr. MERCER disapproved of this claim entirely, and contended, that if the principle in this claim was admitted, it would open the door to an endless class of claims, which would be pressed upon Congress from year to year. The same principle would apply to the regular army, to volunteers and militia, who might be discharged before their term of service expired, and by this means there might be a large number of claims of militia called out during the last war, brought before Congress.

After a few remarks by Mr. BELL, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to amend the Senate's amendment, by adding a clause appropriating of $100,000 for arming and equipping the militia of the United States; which was agreed to.

Mr. STANDEFER then moved an amendment of $15,000 for one month's pay to the fifteen companies of Tennessee volunteers who had equipped themselves, and rendezvoused at Athens, in the State of Tennessee, for the purpose of going against the Seminoles in Florida.

Mr. STANDEFER advocated this claim at some length, and urged upon the House the necessity of granting this claim.

Mr. CAMBRELENG implored of gentlemen not to introduce new claims at this late stage of the session, as it would take all the time of the session to get through with those claims which had come regularly into the House through committees.

The amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. DUNLAP then moved an amendment, allowing to those troops of Tennessee, who had turned out under the requisition of General Gaines, the same sum as those troops who had been mustered into the service of the United States, and immediately discharged.

After a few remarks by Mr. DUNLAP, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. TOUCEY moved an amendment appropriating $40,000 for the payment of the Connecticut militia, called into the service during the last war, in the following cases: First, those called out to repel actual invasion. Secondly, those called out under State authority, and afterwards received into the service of the United States; and thirdly, where they were called out under the requisition of the President of the United States, or any other officer of the United States.

After a few remarks by Messrs. TOUCEY and CAMBRELENG, the amendment was disagreed to—ayes 52, noes 72.

Mr. McKAY then offered an amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the payment of the North Carolina militia in similar cases with the above amendment.

After a few remarks by Messrs. TOUCEY and WHITLESEY of Ohio, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LAWLER proposed an amendment appropriating $15,000 for one month's pay to the Alabama volunteers, called out under the requisition of General Scott, but were not mustered into service owing to the neglect of the United States officers.

After a few remarks by Mr. LAWLER, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWENS then proposed as an amendment: That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be appropriated to reimburse the State of Georgia for moneys expended, or to be expended, by said State, in payment for the services of volunteers in the Creek and Seminole wars, for losses sustained by them, and medical attendance furnished them, during said service, or in going to or returning from the place of rendezvous, the said volunteers not having been regularly mustered into the army of the United States, and, under the existing laws, not entitled to pay; but authorized to be paid by an act of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, passed 26th December, 1836, provided that good and sufficient evidence be furnished the War Department, that the said volunteers, in said act designated, have been paid by said State in conformity with its provisions.

Mr. OWENS said he concurred with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. CAMBRELENG, that at this late period of the session, nothing should be done to prevent the progress of the bill. Mr. O. did not wish to embarrass its passage, or to consume the time of the House; he proposed the amendment from a sense of duty; and to satisfy the services of a most meritorious class of citizens who were volunteers, and engaged in the service of the country, and who performed actual services during the Seminole and Creek wars, but who were not mustered into the service of the United States, and consequently, under the existing laws, not entitled to compensation. There is no member of the House who will not readily agree that volunteers of this description, and who performed actual and important services, at a period when the savages were carrying on their customary barbarous and exterminating warfare, should not be permitted to sustain the losses incurred, and receive no compensation. Most of the amendments which have preceded that offered by him (Mr. O.) are distinct, and have not the claims to justice upon which his was founded. The volunteers contemplated by them, are those only who marched to the place of rendezvous, or who were on their way to the place of rendezvous, and returned home, not having been engaged or been partaking in the strife; but the volunteers, who have fought with gallantry, and displayed a devotion to the interest of their country that not only entitles them to the poor compensation of soldiers, but the eternal gratitude of the inhabitants of that portion of the country afflicted by the savage inroads of the enemy, but that of the Republic at large. The Legislature of Georgia, taking a just and political view of the subject, and knowing that these volunteers were persons the least able to bear the loss incurred by removal from their occupations and homes, and considering them fully entitled to compensation, have passed an act recognising their claims, and made provision for their payment. The sums so paid, or to be paid, by the State, the object of the amendment is to have reimbursed by the Government. A claim so just and meritorious in its character, he (Mr. O.) cannot permit himself to doubt the House will consider its duty, as well as its pleasure, to satisfy; to refuse it would not only be unjust to the State, but contrary to the plainest dictates of national policy. It would be saying to the citizen, whenever in a case of alarm, in hostile aggression, he rushes to the defence of his country, or to the protection of his neighbors, unless he has the authority of the Government—unless he is mustered into the service of the United States—no matter what may be the services performed or the public benefit attained—he is to be told he acted upon his own responsibility, and is therefore not entitled to the consideration of Congress—that he only did his duty as a citizen. If the House address this language to those gallant citizens, who are not only willing, but able, to defend the country, the consequence will be that none but those who are compelled or forced by law, will be found to march in defence of their fellow citizens, when hostile aggressions are made on their persons or property. It would seem to him (Mr. O.) to be the interest as well as the paramount duty of the House to give encouragement to the citizen at the first warning, at the first summons of hostilities, to place himself in an attitude of defence, and to be ready to repel aggression. Encourage their ardor—add fuel to their patriotism—but do not, by a misplaced and ill judged economy, repress both.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had the same objection to this amendment which he had to all the others. It had not been examined and reported upon by a committee of the House.

Mr. ALFORD made an earnest appeal to the House in support of this amendment, and drew a glowing picture of the sufferings of the citizens on the frontiers of Georgia and Alabama. The State of Georgia had, with a noble liberality, paid the volunteers who had rallied to the protection of the frontier inhabitants, and it was but right and proper she should be reimbursed for this expenditure.

After some further remarks by Mr. WHITTLESEY, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOVE submitted an amendment, making it the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the pensioners of the United States to be paid at such pension agencies as the pensioners themselves might designate.

Mr. L. said there would be no necessity for this amendment if the officers of the Government would do their duty; but, as they would not do this, it was the duty of Congress to make them do it. He then went on at some length to point out abuses existing in the State of New York in relation to the payment of pensioners. The pensioners formerly were paid at the city of New York, but it had been removed to Albany, for what purpose Mr. L. did not know, unless for the benefit of a bank at that place, in which partisans of the administration were large stockholders, which put pensioners to considerable expense; whereas, at the city of New York, those pensioners in the remote parts of the State, could receive their pay free of expense, through their merchants, who regularly visited New York.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said if they went on at this rate there was no telling where they would end. If his colleague had been as anxious to get this alleged abuse corrected as he was to make a speech, he would have brought this measure before the Committee on Pensions and had it properly brought before the House. He considered that they were more accountable for the speeches they made at this late hour of the session, than for any thing else, and he hoped gentlemen would not now be pressing upon the committee their new claims.

Mr. TURRILL replied to his colleague (Mr. Love,) and vindicated the Secretary of War, from the imputation cast upon him by the gentleman. Every gentleman who knew the Secretary of War ad interim, knew that he never could be operated upon by any but pure and patriotic motives; and the insinuations cast out by the gentleman, that this pension agency had been changed for political purposes, was gratuitous.

After some remarks by Messrs. WARDWELL and LOVE, the amendment was rejected—yeas 38, noes 98.

The amendments of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The committee then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, took up the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States, for the year 1837."

Mr. CAMBRELENG, after a few words of explanation, moved to strike from the bill the following clause:

"For incidental expenses attending repairs of fortifications, and for the purchase of additional land in their neighborhood, $100,000," which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved two additional items, as follows:

"For fortifications at New London harbor, Connecticut river, $50,000."

"For fortifications at the mouth of Connecticut river, $40,000."

Mr. DUNLAP opposed it, and Mr. INGHAM and Mr. HALEY supported it, when it was agreed to.

Mr. YELL moved an amendment appropriating $50,000 for the completion of new fortifications on the frontier of Arkansas, in addition to the money already appropriated; which was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS moved an amendment, appropriating $50,000 for a fortification at the mouth of the river Penobscot.

After some remarks by Messrs. PARKS and HALL of Vermont, the amendment was disagreed to—yeas 59, noes 66.

Mr. PARKS then moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment making appropriations for fortifications at New London and the mouth of Connecticut river was adopted, as above stated.

After a few words by Messrs. PARKS, MERCER, CAMBRELENG, INGHAM, and VANDERPOEL.

The hour of three o'clock having arrived, the House took a recess, in pursuance of the order of yesterday, until half past 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Pursuant to the order adopted on Thursday, the House resumed its session at half past 4 o'clock, P. M. and again went into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and proceeded with the consideration of the "Fortification bill."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. PARKS to reconsider the vote by which an item of appropriation for the fortifications at New London and at the mouth of the Connecticut river, in the State of Connecticut, was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS went on to demonstrate the superior claims of the mouth of the Penobscot to the Connecticut river, recommended, as it had been, by the War Department, and by the peculiar vicinity of the State of Maine to a foreign country, bounded only by a line of 140 miles by the Union, but by 500 miles on the British frontier. He adverted to several incidents during the late war, wherein the exposed situation of that point was made evident, and its importance proved to show that there was no spot upon the whole Atlantic coast that more required an expenditure than that did—quoting the opinion of Commodore Morris to that fact and referring to the bill reported some sessions since by the Senate of the United States, and lost in the House only because it could not be reached.

Mr. PEARCE of R. I. had voted for the appropriation for

New London, and gave his reasons for doing so. He insisted that the cases of Portland and New London were not analogous. The latter was an old work, but not even the ground was broken for the former. In reference to New London there ought to be no question, nor could any appropriation be made of so much importance to so many interests as for that point.

Mr. TOUCEY adverted to the little that had been hitherto done for the State of Connecticut up to this time. There had been appropriated for fortifications altogether, up to the year 1833, upwards of $16,000,000, out of which there were expended for fortifications in that State the small sum of only $79,000, from the foundation of the Government to the present time. It was in evidence that that State, in the late war, had herself expended more in defending the commerce from the British, than the whole sum expended in her defence by the General Government, and that money had never yet been returned. The importance of the points proposed was unquestionable, and been again and again recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, the engineers of the United States, the War Department itself, and now by the Committee of Ways and Means. He had no objection to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Maine, but surely the failure of his success presented no good reason for defeating an object against which nothing could be said.

Mr. GRENNELL went into an expose of the importance this place had always been held in from its earliest foundation, as far back as the year 1635, down to the revolution. It was the second port built by the British settlers on this continent, and had always been cherished by them as the key almost to New England. What had been suffered during the late war in consequence of the neglect at the mouth of the Connecticut river? Twenty vessels destroyed at one time, with an immense amount of property, all for want of proper fortifications.

Mr. MEAY was opposed to the appropriation for the mouth of Connecticut river, because no survey had been made for that purpose. He suggested that when the bill came into the House, that part of the amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG agreed with the gentleman from N. Carolina hoping the whole amendment would not be reconsidered, but strike out the later branch of the amendment in the House. The first branch, being for an old work, came properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ways and Means, but this did not apply to the item for the mouth of Connecticut river.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to without a division.

Mr. JARVIS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of Mr. PARKS, appropriating $50,000 for fortifications at the mouth of Penobscot river was rejected, but the motion did not prevail—67 to 76.

Mr. BELL then said that he had no wish to delay any of the other appropriation bills the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means might desire to pass through the committee this evening; but he thought this the most proper bill, under all circumstances, to submit a motion which might, or might not, cause some discussion. He had hoped this bill would have been the last taken up, as he considered it the one of the least importance of all the others.

Mr. B. would, in the outset, call the attention of the committee to some few facts which appeared to have been overlooked. He then went into a statement showing the large increase of appropriations for this branch of the service over those of former years, and that the amount on hand was seven or eight hundred thousand, or a million of dollars, besides what was appropriated in this bill, for the identical objects embraced in it. After some further remarks, Mr. B. submitted his amendment, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, 1838, reserving a sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, on the terms of the 13th, 14th, and 15th provisions of the act regulating the deposits of the public money, approved the 23d of June, 1836.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell,) in relation to excess of appropriations in the Treasury, said he had only to remark, that there was a great deal of deception in relation to those appropriations; because, although the money was in the Treasury, in most cases the works for which it was appropriated were already under contract. The Committee of Ways and Means were at one time of opinion with the gentleman from Tennessee. They knowing that there were large amounts of money on hand in the Treasury, they made inquiries at the proper departments, and ascertained that, although there was a surplus on hand at present, yet the probability was that the appropriations would, in all probability, fall short during the ensuing year.

Mr. C. then sent to the clerk's table a report from the Engineer Department, showing the objects for which the appropriations were required, which showed that all the appropriations proposed in the bill would be needed during the ensuing year.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina advocated the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, on the ground of its recognizing a system of permanent distribution, from which he (Mr. W.) could see no possible evil that could result.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia said, that having voted for the deposit act of the last session, and intending to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, he felt it due to himself briefly to state the reasons which induced him to vote as he now intended to do. He said that he felt no regret for the vote which he gave for the deposit act of the last session; he not only felt no regret, but was well satisfied that the vote was right and proper; such a one as, under like circumstances, he would give again. When the deposit act passed there was a large actually existing surplus in the Treasury, which, upon every reasonable data of calculation would, by the close of the year, amount to about forty millions of dollars, and which had since been ascertained to be $42,000,000. Upon every reasonable basis of estimate, and perhaps more, than what ought to be the actual wants and expenditures of the Government. In this state of things, this immense amount of revenue would, without some disposition of it, remain unemployed in the hands of the Federal Government, or be employed by the deposit banks for their individual profit. He said he need not say that he thought it too dangerous to permit such an immense amount of unappropriated money to remain for so long a time in the hands of the Government unemployed for any public purpose; that he would not trust this Government with such immense means of patronage and corruption, to be administered by whom it might. There is nothing so dangerous in its employment, or corrupting in its use, as money; and he did not regard any Government so inflexible in its virtue, or so far above the reach of temptation, as to trust it unnecessarily with means of so extraordinary and dangerous temptation.

He said that he was clearly convinced of the propriety of this sentiment, from the fact that this Government, not the executive administration, but the Government, was daily making rapid advances in the exercise of powers, and the increase of expenditure and patronage, not warranted by the Constitution, and dangerous to the rights of the States, and the liberties of the people. In appropriations, which were daily sought, for bays, harbors, roads, canals, and other like subjects, many of them of a trivial and unimportant character, were indicated a continued increase of the expenditures of this Government, and consequently the enlargement of its sphere of patronage, of a most fearful character; indications which, he candidly acknowledged, were at war with those principles of economy and simplicity which should never be lost sight of in the administration of this Government. He begged every gentleman to look at the progress of expenditure, and the indications of the future, from bills now pending, and be admonished of the necessity of a more vigilant watchfulness over the taxing and appropriating power of this Government.

He said he was unwilling to leave this immense amount of money, improperly and unnecessarily collected from the tax paying part of the community, in the possession of the deposit banks, to strengthen their means of speculation, always of a demoralizing tendency, and improve their profits at the expense of the people; profits which would annually exceed two million of dollars. Between these two alternatives and that of a deposit in the State treasuries a choice was to be made: either choice was an evil, and the choice was between evils. He voted to place the funds in the State treasuries, because, in doing so, he voted to take this immense means of temptation to prodigal and extravagant expenditures of corrupting tendency, from this Government, and took from the banks the means of extended speculations and enormous profits on money not belonging to them but properly belonging to the people, and placed the surplus revenue where its profits could be employed by the State Governments for the benefit of the people, from whom it had been unconstitutionally drawn. The surplus was then an actual existing evil, tangible in form and shape, produced by accidental, uncontrollable, circumstances. For this evil a remedy was necessary; the remedy which was applied, although an admitted evil, was the least which could be applied to such a dangerous disease.

He said he would remark one thing, that among all the objections which had been urged to that measure, from whatever sources they came, none had recommended a better remedy for the existing evil. Mr. G. said that the reasons which had induced him to vote for the bill of the last session did not now exist; then there was an actual existing surplus, now there was none; the amendment proposed was in anticipation of a surplus. He would not take so important and dangerous a step until the evil actually existed to render it necessary; he would not anticipate it, for he hoped and believed it would not exist, and the adoption of this amendment might prevent the reduction of the tariff, the proper remedy for a surplus. He said that, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, the revenue of the current year would be about $25,000,000.

Of the appropriations for the last year $14,000,000 would be chargeable upon the revenue of the current year, on account of the operation of the deposit act; the estimate of appropriations for the service of the current year is $25,000,000. He did not doubt that, although it should not, it will be more, which will, taking these estimates to be true, leave a deficit to be drawn from the deposits with the States; but admitting the estimate to be too low, as to the receipts from the public lands, and that they will equal the last year's sales, then under any circumstances, the surplus will not exceed $5,000,000. In addition to this, he said it was proper to remark, that large appropriations might yet be required to suppress Indian hostilities, and if he did not mistake the signs of the times, large appropriations might be necessary to meet a conflict of a far more formidable and expensive character than any which we have had with the Indian tribes. For these reasons, if he had no other, he said he should vote against this amendment.

Mr. G. said, that when he voted for the deposit act of the last session, he voted for it as being what it professed to be, a mere deposit act, and not a distribution act in disguise, as it had been frequently characterized; nor did he intend to adopt the principles of that bill as a system, for if the deposit principle is to be adopted as a system, he would prefer the constitutional principle proposed by a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, as more just and more equal in its operation. He said that he was utterly and entirely opposed to the distribution principle: it was corrupting in its operations and dangerous in its tendencies.

If the system be adopted, there can be no doubt that, under our indirect and insidious system of taxation, the State Governments would ultimately look to this Government for the means of conducting their domestic works, and sustaining their domestic institutions; that they would make diligent and active search for every possible subject of expenditure, until, finally, the people and the State Governments would cease to watch the pecuniary operations of the Federal Government with their accustomed vigilance, and make no effort to arrest its march to consolidation; and, finally, be engulfed in its corrupting influence. The demands of the States would be met by corresponding taxation here, and a surplus produced for the purpose of distribution. He regarded this system as many distinguished gentlemen had heretofore regarded it—the most dangerous and corrupting which could be incorporated into our legislation.

Mr. G. said that the true remedy was to reduce the taxation of the people to the wants of the Government, and the wants of the Government to the most economical expenditure; economy and simplicity being essential to purity, and purity to the maintenance of republican institutions. He said, Mr. Chairman, we must come to it; we must reduce the expenditures of this Government and the taxes of the people; this they will compel you to do, if they properly regard their rights and their liberties.

Sir, this Government has no right to burthen the tax paying community to raise a surplus for any purpose of distribution whatever. The money beyond the demands of the Government is most secure, and most equally distributed, by remaining in the pockets of its rightful owners, the people, from whence, by the Constitution, it ought not to be drawn except for constitutional objects. He said he could not anticipate but with the most fearful apprehension, any system which should prevent the States from relying upon their own resources for their domestic purposes, and cause them to rely upon this Government. He could not, under any circumstances, sanction such a principle. He thought there was a salutary lesson afforded in the scramble which had been produced in some of the State Legislatures for the disposition of their portions of the surplus given to them under the first experiment.

Mr. G. said he had another strong objection to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Bell). It was in effect a deposit law, sought to be engrained upon a simple appropriation bill, embracing subjects totally distinct and dissimilar in their characters; upon the same principle a tariff or any other incongruous law might be engrained upon an appropriation bill, and produce the greatest confusion upon the statute book. He thought that there ought to be the greatest possible system and congruity attainable in the framing of our laws. If he were otherwise favorable to the amendment, he would not vote for its adoption as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, because the object of it was to send the money back to the people, instead of keeping it in the vaults of the deposit banks, to enrich their stockholders, and add to the salary of their agent at Washington. He went on to point out the large increase in the number of deposit banks, especially in the State of New York, within the last year, and contended those banks were selected, and favored, with a view to aid the administration in carrying out its political views. He then contrasted the amount of public money on deposit in the banks in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Michigan, and attributed this difference more to the fact that some of those banks paid a contribution to an agent at Washington, and some did not, than to any thing else, and invariably, said he, those banks who pay a good sum to an agent, get the largest amount of deposits. He feared there was some improper influence at work in the selection of these banks, and therefore he wished the source of corruption to be removed, and he considered this proposition as the best means of removing it.

Mr. G. then asked the permission of his friend from Kentucky to explain; which being granted, he said, that the selected banks for the deposits of the public money, were not restricted as to the amount of deposits which they might receive by the amount of their capital previous to the deposit act of the last session, and that several of them had an amount on deposit equal to, if not beyond, their capital; that by the deposit act of the last session, the Secretary of the Treasury was bound to withdraw from any bank the excess of public deposits beyond three-fourths of their capital, and to place the excess in some other bank. This act rendered it necessary, during the last summer and autumn, to make many selections of new banks. This was particularly necessary in New York, because more than half the revenue from imports is collected in the city of New York.

The transfers which were made necessary in the execution of the deposit act, did not necessarily take effect immediately, but in the usual periods of all transfers, having reference to the amount, and the distance the money was to be sent. Mr. G. said, if his friend from Kentucky would put himself to the trouble of going to the department and examining the proceedings of the department, he would be perfectly satisfied that this matter was all right and proper, and that the law had been executed without any reference to electioneering purposes whatever, but in perfect good faith.

Mr. UNDERWOOD having inquired what were Mr. GARLAND'S views as to the proceeds of the public lands—

Mr. G. said he would, without hesitation, answer the question, as he had no wish to conceal any opinion which he entertained. He said that in all the acts of cession of the public lands from the States, he regarded the intention of the cessions to be to create a common fund, for the common benefit of the States, to be applied to the general benefit of all the States in their federative character, and not for the individual use of any single State, or for distribution among them in equal portions for their separate, unconnected individual use. He regarded the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as constituting a part of the revenue of the country, to be disposed of in the same way, and under the same constitutional restrictions, as revenue derived from any other source; that to the principal tax paying States, this appropriation of it was most beneficial, as to that amount, it would diminish the onerous effect of the present oppressive tariff. He said that he was opposed, upon constitutional grounds, to giving away a single acre of the public lands, or one dollar of its proceeds; that he was opposed to any pre-emption bill upon principle, and that he preferred selling the public lands, restricting inordinate speculations, bringing into the Treasury the proceeds, and to their amount, reducing the revenue from imports.

Mr. MANN submitted an amendment to the amendment, providing that the deposit should be in proportion to the ratio of representation in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. M. asked, where was the necessity of the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee? or had the gentleman any data upon which to estimate the amount of money to be appropriated under that proposition? And could they adopt it without that? The gentleman should have done what was done by an honorable Senator—introduced it at an early period of the session; for this amendment and that bill were identical. If, however, it should be adopted, Mr. M. had prepared his amendment to prevent the reputation of one of the greatest constitutional outrages that had ever taken place since the formation of this Government—indirectly done, to be sure, but not the less grievous. By the distribution law—for he would call it by its right name, it was "distribution," though a mental reservation had been made by the use of the word "deposits"—the people of the large States had been sacrificed to the interest of those of the small States. He was opposed to distribution in any way whatever; and even if his amendment should be incorporated in the provision under consideration, it would still be open to all his objections, though it would render it less unjust in its operation. He expressed his surprise at such a measure coming from the quarter it did. What had become of the once cherished State right doctrines? Where the doctrine of a strict construction of the Constitution? Was it the design to continue the present oppressive system of taxation, for the purpose of collecting large amounts of money from the people to distribute it back in an unequal ratio, with the loss to the whole people of the enormous expenses of collection? He entered his solemn protest against the whole principle.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said he rose first to correct the error of the gentleman from Kentucky. He charges that the distribution of the public money, under the law of June last, has been made with political views, with party purposes and motives, and cites the history of the removal in the city of New York.

He informs us that, immediately prior to the election, the funds which had long been deposited in but three banks, on the eve of the election were distributed among eleven banks; and he asks what motive but party motives could have induced the removal, when three banks, or one bank, could have kept the money quite as safely.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, the facts are briefly these: you collect seventeen millions of revenue in that city; twelve millions lay in the three deposit banks on the date of the passage of the distribution bill in June last. I deem it most improper and improvident to leave such large sums in any bank, amounting to the double of their aggregate capital—so this Congress held; and one of the material essential provisions of the deposit bill was that no bank should hold an amount of public money exceeding three-fourths of the capital of such bank. The whole amount of the bank capital of that city, is nominally eighteen millions and a half of dollars; several of those banks would not take it. I myself advised one, in which I have some interest, not to accept the trust; it must soon be repaid; it was soon to be distributed; the receiving bank would certainly loan it; it would get invested in western lands or city lots, or India voyages, and could not be reached in time.

Well, sir, seven millions and a half must be removed, besides the large daily accruing revenue; the law was imperative; the coercion of the law was the motive, and not party politics, as the gentleman alleges, which distributed the money from three to eleven banks. I know the facts as to the city, party have no view or influence; the law made the distribution, and so far as I have made myself acquainted with the distribution in all the State, and I have spent much time and pains to inform myself, no equal sum of money was ever removed with so much skill, care, and prudence.

No financier, perhaps, was ever employed in a task so delicate or difficult; compelled by law to remove nearly forty millions of money, in direct violation of all the laws of trade, against all the usual currents of money. Every financial man anticipated deep injury, perhaps ruin. I call on every financial man in this House to show me how Mr. Underwood could have performed this unprecedented duty with less injury to the pecuniary concerns of the nation.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, it was not my purpose to say a word on this or any other question. We have but a few remaining days, and I feel deeply the obligation to waste no time in mere words; but being on the floor, I must briefly notice the merits of the question. It is precisely another distribution bill. I shudder at a second distribution; though I feel too deeply the scenes we have just passed, or now passing.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I rarely give reasons for my vote. I shall, however, vote against this amendment, on the ground I voted against the distribution law of June: it is the same thing; my views are unchanged. I vote against it, because it leads to the collection of money which the owners had better keep than the Government; because it levies money for a purpose which the Constitution does not warrant; because it corrupts our election; because members of Congress will be chosen in reference to the amount of money they will pledge themselves to draw from the federal coffers, and plant in their several districts. I know the fact, that electioneering on this principle is now in process, because I believe that, sooner or later, the inevitable effect will be to vote as little as possible for federal purposes; to withhold from the army, the navy, the fortifications, the proper necessary appropriations, and, finally, render the Federal Government a mere rope of sand.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I do regret that the time will not admit—I feel solemnly the obligation to proceed to action,—or I would go into a detailed argument on this occasion—on no occasion did I ever desire it so strongly.

Mr. THOMPSON of S. C. designated the idea of the States being corrupted by the distribution of their money among them, as one of the "humbuggeries" of the age. How could they be corrupted? Could they, by expending their money in works of internal improvement, and to purposes of education, corrupt the citizens of the States? The notion was absurd. But what was to be done with it? Was it to be left in the hands of the executive officers of the Federal Government, to be distributed over the country as might best subserve their views and designs? The evil had been brought upon them, not by the aid or co-operation of the party to which Mr. T. belonged, but in spite of all they could do to prevent it. He was anxious that the General Government should be brought back to its pristine condition, with the power to collect only as much revenue as would be necessary for its economical expenditure; and in cases of extraordinary emergency each State might be called upon to furnish its quota, to be levied by herself, upon her own citizens, with reference to their own peculiar interests, instead of pursuing a general system of taxation which, while it professed to bear equally upon all, was necessarily unjust upon a very large portion. This would even be better than under the old confederation, because now the power to collect existed.

Mr. CRARY rose and said, that he did not know why Michigan and the banks of Michigan should so often be made the subject of attack in that House. At the last session of Congress an honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Allan) had thought proper to pronounce the deposit banks of Michigan, risky concerns; but no evidence was produced in support of his charge. On the present occasion they had again been brought to the notice of the House and the country by another honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood.) He said he thought the attack unnecessary and uncalled for. He was free to say, and prepared to demonstrate, that there were no banks in the country established upon a more permanent basis. They were able, at any moment, to discharge all their liabilities to the Government, without in the slightest degree affecting their credit. If their specie on hand be taken as a standard by which to judge them, this would be found to compare well with the banks of any of the States, even those on the Atlantic border. This, however, showed only a small part of their ability. Almost every bank at the east had its paper in their vaults. As an evidence of their ability, and also of their fidelity, he would state that, within the past twenty months, they had paid over to the Government almost $9,000,000, and they had paid this sum with a promptitude which commended them to the confidence of the whole country. He hesitated not to say that there were no better banks in the country. He defied the whole power of the Government to affect them. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) had insinuated that the deposits in those banks were superior to be larger than in other banks, for the purpose of having an influence upon the Presidential election in that quarter. He need state but a few facts to convince the gentleman of his error. It is well known in Michigan that the officers of one of those banks call themselves the friends of this administration, and yet in that bank there was on deposit on the first of December only $255,541; while in the other bank, whose officers are of the party of the gentleman himself, there was on deposit, at the same period, $1,190,513. If this is the way in which the money of the Government is used for political purposes, it certainly was not calculated to produce any very favorable results to the present administration. It had not been thus used in his State. He said that he had tried to have the deposits distributed so as to benefit some of his own political friends, but had not succeeded. With this evidence before him, he was bound to defend the Secretary of the Treasury from the insinuations of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. C. said he embraced the occasion to say that he was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell,) and to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann.) On no account could he be induced to vote for a distribution of the surplus on the basis advocated by either of those gentlemen. The bill of the last session, called a deposit bill, but in fact a bill of distribution, was a bill of abominations. It distributed the public money unequally, unjustly. That money had been collected from the people of every section of the Union. It was paid into the Treasury by them, not in the proportion to their respective representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives, nor in the proportion to their respective representations in the House alone; but in a proportion altogether at variance with either. It had been drawn from the people of the old States and the new, and not of the States only, but also of the Territories, and in proportion to their population at the present time. To distribute it, you went back to the census, taken six years ago, thus giving money to the people of the old States, which you had taken from the people of the new States. By that act the people whom he had the honor to represent, were deprived of a large sum of money which had been pillaged from them when they were unrepresented upon that floor; when they were denied a voice in the national councils. You propose now to re-enact the same scene of injustice. He could not consent to it. If there was to be another distribution, there should be another census, and that census should form the basis of the distribution. In that way alone the surplus in your Treasury would be returned to those who had paid it there. In that way alone could justice be done to the people of his own State, to the people of the whole western country.

He stood there not to arouse sectional prejudices. He had no disposition to make appeals to any particular section of the country. It was the duty of that House to legislate for the whole country; and he was ready to carry out such a system of legislation. If the Atlantic coast needed fortifications, he was disposed to vote for them; and after voting to expend some twenty millions dollars on that border, he would vote for all legitimate objects of appropriation in the western section of the country. He had voted for the amendment of the gentleman, (Mr. Ingham,) from Connecticut. He thought it ought to prevail. He could subscribe to all that had been said in favor of it. He would also vote for the amendment of the gentleman, (Mr. Parks,) from Maine, for he considered that appropriation necessary also. He was disposed to vote for other appropriations for works along the coast of that State. He believed it ought to be fortified. We had a question of boundary to settle there, and it might have to be settled by a resort to arms. We ought to prepare for such an event. He would vote the fifty thousand dollars, and if that was not sufficient, he was disposed to vote a still greater amount—for five hundred thousand dollars, if the gentleman from Maine called for it. He believed it would be needed before the question of boundary was adjusted to the satisfaction of the American people.

Mr. ROBERTSON was prepared to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee and the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and in so doing he should not consider that he was prejudicing the interests of any body. This proposition was not a new one, as had been asserted by some gentlemen on that floor, but it was an old proposition, which had been before the House and before the country, and had been discussed and considered, and found to be a salutary proposition. He could see no danger to be apprehended in adopting this measure, because it was only getting back from the General Government that which she had forced from the pockets of the people, in collection of revenues under the high tariff system.

Mr. BOULDIN addressed the House at some length on the subject, generally, of the present mode of disposing of the public domain.

Mr. LANE said, that as soon as the committee should become composed, so that he could be heard, he would proceed to address them with that brevity suited to the close of a protracted sitting of ten hours. He was not ambitious to address a wearied and impatient audience. That his apology must be found in the injustice of the proposition upon which he is called upon to vote. A proposition so manifestly oppressive to that portion of the people he had the honor to represent that, to give a silent vote, would be reckless to his own duty, and regardless of his interests.

The proposition now to be determined, and the only one in order for debate, is to distribute the surplus revenue among the several States agreeably to the representation in this branch of Congress. To distribute, (said Mr. L.) because no one believed a cent of it will ever be called for, or returned by the States.

The money proposed to be divided, has been collected, not from the old States, not agreeably to the representation in this House, but from the whole people; and whether regarded as arising from the sales of the public lands, or upon duties upon merchandise, it has been paid according to population, not representation, in direct proportion to the amount paid for land, and the consumption of imported articles. That if any disproportion in the collection of the amount proposed to be returned to the people exists, it is because the people of the new States have purchased more of the public lands than those of the old.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Robertson) has informed the committee that he will sustain the proposition, in order that his constituents may participate in the benefits arising from the sales of the public lands, and prevent them from being taken by force or fraud.

Sir (said Mr. L.) the people of the new States ask for nothing unequal or unjust; nor would they take from the people of the old States that to which they are not entitled, either by force or fraud, nor will they silently submit to be plundered by the old States upon this floor.

Sir, while the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Robertson) is so liberal in attributing force and fraud to the new States, is he aware that he is advocating a proposition that would take the money from the pockets of the people of the new States, and place it in the pockets of his own constituents? That would place millions of dollars in the hands of the people of the old States, which had been drawn from the pockets of the people of the new. Not by force, not by fraud, but by votes upon this floor, by unjust, unequal, and unconstitutional legislation.

The white population of Indiana is greater than that of Virginia or Kentucky. As proof of this fact, it is only necessary to refer the committee to the votes polled at the late Presidential election. Indiana gave several thousand more than Kentucky; and the State of Ohio many thousand more than Pennsylvania; yet, sir, this proposition would give to Virginia three times as much as to Indiana, the former having twenty-one members on this floor, the latter but seven. The State of Kentucky would receive double the amount paid to Indiana; the one having fourteen, the other seven members, in this House. At the same time no gentleman would risk his reputation for veracity, by saying the population of Indiana did not exceed Kentucky, or that the people of Indiana had not contributed more to the sum to be divided than the people of Kentucky. So with Ohio; she would receive one-third less than Pennsylvania. This disproportion, in a greater or less degree, would hold good with all the new States, compared with the old.

Sir, the injustice of the proposition is palpable at first blush, and ought not to receive the countenance of any honorable man on this floor. Mr. L. said, he put it to honorable gentlemen from the old States to say, if such a proceeding would be generous, or magnanimous. What is the principle proposed and urged upon the committee? No more or less unjust and oppressive than to impose taxes upon the people of the new States, according to their numbers, per capita, beyond the wants of the Government, and then return to the people of the old States, not only what had been taken from them, but one-half of the amount taken from the new. In other words, to return to the people of the new States one-half the sum to which they were entitled, and the other half to the old States, over and above the amount to which they are in justice entitled.

To call this force, to call it fraud, would be terms too mild; it would be oppression in the exaction, and plunder in the division. (Here Mr. Robertson explained.)

Mr. L. said, he was aware that, by the provisions of the Constitution, all direct taxation for the wants of the Government had to be made according to the representation upon this floor; and that if the money had been drawn from the States in that manner, such a division, such a return, would be just, because equal. That, however, is not the case; the money to be divided has not been drawn from the States, in that proportion, but according to population, regardless of representation, here or elsewhere.

Sir, what has produced such an extraordinary change in the opinions of honorable members. A few years since, it was proposed to divide among the States the money arising from the sales of the public lands, by the land bill, originating with a distinguished Senator in another part of this House. It passed the Senate and this House by an overwhelming majority; by the provisions of this bill, each of the new States in which the public lands were located, received large donations of land and twelve and a half per cent. out of the proceeds of the sales within the State, and the balance divided equal among all the States, based upon the census of 1830, which is the basis of the present proposition. This was intended to make up in some degree for the increased and increasing population of the new over the old States.

In this, there was something generous, magnanimous, on the part of the advocates of the bill, towards the people of the new States, compared with the present proposition. The same gentlemen in this House who were the advocates of that bill, are now the advocates of this proposition. Are honorable gentlemen prepared to give the reason, and the cause, for such a sudden change having passed over the vision of their political dreams? Is it to be found in the action of the people of the new States, in relation to recent and former elections of an important character? Surely not; no gentleman will admit this; though any one would be at a loss to find any other reason for such change.

Mr. L. said the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) had, with an air of confidence, given the committee his reasons for supporting the proposition. That the money in the hands of the deposit banks increased the Executive influence of the General Government; that it was not only improperly deposited, but used for political purposes to influence public opinion; that his honorable friend desired its removal from the pet banks, as he is pleased to call them, because these banks, or those who manage them, are the friends of the administration, and use the money for their own benefit.

Mr. L. said he was equally desirous of the removal of the money of the people from the possession and control of the banks, because they are, so far as his part of the country is concerned, most decidedly opposed to the administration and all those who sustain it. They use the power which the public deposits give them for political purposes, and not for the public good; not to accommodate the people, whose money it is, but to advance the interest of the favored few; to oppress, not to relieve; in short, to shave and oppress the people with the money of the people.

One word in reply to the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Thompson.) He urges, with his wonted zeal and eloquence, the adoption of the amendment, because it will take the possession of the money from the Federal, and place it in the hands of the State Governments. That if left in the power of the Executive it will be used to corrupt the people. That in the hands of the State authorities, it cannot be employed for any such purpose; the people of the States are incorruptible. Sir, (said Mr. L.) if the people of the States of this Union are incorruptible, he would like to have the gentleman inform the committee who it is he apprehends would be corrupted by the Executive of the Federal Government. To conclude (Mr. L. said) he had too much confidence in the justice of the members of the committee to suppose they would for a moment entertain such a proposition. He would, therefore, not detain the committee at so late an hour.

Mr. CAMBRELENG obtained the floor, and said he would willingly waive all opportunity to speak, but made made an earnest appeal to the committee to take the question.

The amendment of Mr. MANN was then rejected without a division.

The question on the amendment of Mr. BELL was taken by tellers, and also disagreed to—ayes 71, noes 75.

Mr. CUSHMAN intimated his intention of submitting an amendment.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose and reported the army and fortification bills, as amended, to the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an adjournment, which prevailed—ayes 70, noes 51; and so

The House adjourned at 9 o'clock, P. M.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1837.

Mr. MCKEAN presented numerous petitions and memorials from females of Philadelphia, ladies of Pittsburg, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, amounting in all to six thousand signatures, praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and Territories of the United States.

Mr. NORVELL objected to their reception.

Mr. WHITE moved to lay the motion of reception on the table.

On which motion Mr. MCKEAN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered—yeas 21, nays 12.

So the motion of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. SWIFT and Mr. EWING of Ohio also presented memorials on the same subject; which were similarly disposed of.

The bill to continue the office of commissioner of pensions; and

The bill to ratify and confirm certain official acts of John Pope, late Governor of Arkansas.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

The bill to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports was taken up, and read the third time, and, on the question, shall the bill pass—

Mr. SOUTHWARD rose and addressed the Senate for some time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CLAY followed, and gave his objections at some considerable length; dwelling principally on what he contended was the interference of some of the provisions of the bill with the compromise act of 1833; and concluded with a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike out all those articles comprised in the bill which now pay a duty of 20 per cent. and upwards, and embraced in the act of 1833, commonly called the compromise act.

Mr. WRIGHT called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, and Webster—24.

After some remarks from Messrs. CALHOUN, PRESTON, BLACK, and TIPTON,

Mr. KNIGHT moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike out "common salt," "earthenware and stone ware," "china ware and porcelain," "button moulds and palm brooms;" which motion was lost—yeas 20, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, and Webster—20.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Moore, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, Hendricks, Knight, McKean, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Robinson, Southard, Spence, Tipton, Tomlinson—18.

The following bills were severally read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

The bill, supplementary to the act, granting half-pay to widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. WHITE,

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, after which

It adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 25, 1837.

Mr. HUNTSMAN moved a reconsideration of the vote of the House, by which a map of the harbor of White Hall had been ordered to be printed, but subsequently withdrew the motion.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the further consideration of the report and resolutions on the subject of our relations with Mexico, was ordered to lie over till Tuesday.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the civil list bill, and that the same be recommitted to the former committee; which was agreed to.

Subsequently Mr. C. reported back the same bill with sundry amendments, which was committed.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of James P. Carlton; read twice and committed.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which had been referred the bill to authorize the Illinois Central Railroad Company to locate and construct a railroad through the public lands, and for other purposes, reported the bill with the following amendments. Add to the 5th section the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed, as to authorize said company to include within the selections to be made by them, the improvement of any actual settler upon the public lands.

Add the following section to the bill:

Sec. . . And he it further enacted, That the same grants, rights, privileges, and immunities that are made and secured in the preceding sections of this act to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, be, and the same are hereby, granted and secured to the Mount Carmel and Alton Railroad Company, to add them in the construction of the Mount Carmel and Alton Railroad, under the same responsibilities and instructions in all respects whatever.

The amendments having been read,

Mr. CASEY moved the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. MCKAY moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole; which motion prevailed.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the Committee on Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the inhabitants of Chenango county, New York, praying Congress to pass a law limiting the sales of the public lands to actual settlers and cultivators; also, the petition of the Rev. Mr. Chase for a pre-emption right, and donation of public lands; also, the memorial of the trustees of the Manual Labor School of Illinois; which memorials and petition were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Col. Charles Larabee; and the same ordered to lie on the table.

SILK.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, made a report on the culture and manufacture of silk.

The report having been read was laid on the table; and on Mr. Adams' motion, 5,000 extra copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARD, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported the following resolution, which, under the rule, lies over one day:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of Senate document, No. 333, entitled "Report of a Geological Reconnaissance, made in 1835, from the seat of Government, by the way of Green Bay and the Wisconsin Territory, to the Coteau de Prairie, by G. W. Featherstonhaugh," United States Geologist, for the use of the members of this House; the same to be printed under the direction of Mr. Featherstonhaugh.

Mr. H. asked that the resolution be considered at this time.

Mr. MERCER said, as he should vote against it, he would then object to its consideration.

The resolution, under the rule, accordingly lies over one day for consideration.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a resolution proposing that on Monday next, at eleven o'clock, the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the space of one hour and a half, for the purpose of considering two bills in relation to the Post Office Department, viz: that providing for the erection of a building for the Post Office Department, and the other providing additional clerks to the same department, in the Auditor's office thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman would not move for the adoption of any special order, till the appropriation bills had been got through.

Mr. STORER moved to amend the resolution, by including in its operation all the bills reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. CONNOR would barely remark, that those were two bills of very great importance, indeed of indispensable necessity to the department with which they were connected, and were the only two bills reported from the Post Office Committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND suggested whether it would not be better to wait till the House went into Committee of the Whole generally.

Mr. CONNOR, in reply to Mr. CAMBRELENG, said he thought these two bills were of an importance little, if any, short of that of some of the appropriation bills.

Mr. STORER'S amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. JARVIS suggested that the resolution be so amended as to make it read on Monday next, "immediately after reading the journal."

Mr. CONNOR, in accordance with that suggestion, moved it as an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. ADAMS hoped some other day than Monday would be selected.

The amendment having been agreed to,

Mr. JARVIS moved further to amend the resolution by adding "and such other bills as the Committee of the Whole may think fit to take up for consideration."

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina expressed a hope that this amendment would not be adopted.

The House disagreed to it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, moved to include the "bill to extend the provisions of an act entitled 'An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution,' approved 7th June, 1832."

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee moved to lay the whole subject on the table: lost—ayes 61, noes 72.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of Va. was also disagreed to.

Mr. LANE moved to include the "bill to authorize the Maumee Branch Railroad Company to construct a railroad through the public lands in Michigan." Lost.

Mr. ADAMS then asked for the yeas and nays on concurring with the resolution so amended, but the House refused to order them, and refused also to concur with the resolution—ayes 88, noes 57, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the select committee on the subject of banks, reported the following joint resolution; which was read.

JOINT RESOLUTION relative to the notes of the Bank of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That until the notes of the late Bank of the United States which may have been returned since the third day of March last, and redeemed out of the funds of the said bank, shall have ceased to be issued by its officers, directors, trustees, or trustees, and until the amount due to the Government from said bank shall be settled to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the notes of said bank, and the notes of any bank to which its funds and estate may have been transferred in trust for the payment of its debts, and the discharge of its duties and obligations, shall not be received in payment of any debts due to the Government of the United States, or taken in exchange, or on deposit in any of banks selected as depositories of the public money; and the Secretary of this Treasury is hereby directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary to carry this provision into effect.

The question being on its second reading,

Mr. LINCOLN at once denounced it as one of the most extraordinary propositions that had ever been brought before this House, and was proceeding to comment upon its character; when

Mr. VINTON rose to a question of order, on the ground, as was understood, that the committee had already reported.

The CHAIR replied that the committee before had only reported in part.

Mr. LINCOLN proceeded, and complained that he had not been consulted, nor present at the adoption of the resolution in the committee, though he had made every effort to find the committee when he received a notification of a meeting, searching almost every committee room in the Capitol, and almost every other supposable place.

Mr. GALBRAITH said it was true there had been two or three ineffectual attempts to get the committee together in the Capitol, but he was not aware that this was in consequence of any neglect on his part. He certainly had given due notice to all the members of the committee who were in the city, and it was no fault of his that they did not attend. At the second meeting of the committee, it was suggested that it would be proper to address a communication to the officers of the United States Bank, and the gentleman from Massachusetts was present at that time, and he himself objected to this communication being sent. Nothing was then done in this matter, but it was decided that he (Mr. C.) should call another meeting of the committee, for the purpose of having a more full attendance, before they proceeded to the adoption of any measure, and he again notified the members of the committee to attend on a particular day at the room of the District Committee in the Capitol, and at that meeting there were but four present, and it was then mentioned that the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mann) were members of a select committee, and could not attend in the morning hour, their engagements on the other select committee preventing them from so doing. It was then proposed to call a meeting in the evening; and as there might be some difficulty in getting into the Capitol at night, they agreed the meeting should be at the rooms of one of the members of the committee. He notified the members of the committee to attend this meeting, and there were five members present at that meeting, who, being a quorum, considered the report, bill, and joint resolution, and unanimously concurred in the same, and directed him to report it to the House. In reply to the inquiry why he had not reported the joint resolution to the House at the same time he made the report, he had only to say, that when he rose to make the report, he held in his hand the report, bill, and resolution, and intended then to report them to the House; but immediately after the report and bill were disposed of, the hour for reports having expired, and a motion being made to proceed to the orders of the day, he was thereby excluded from reporting the joint resolution at that time. Mr. G. then, for the life of him, could not see why the gentleman complained of this proceeding. He had given all the members notice, and if they did not choose to attend the meetings of the committee, it was their own fault.

Mr. LINCOLN said this resolution involved grave considerations, and should have had the most serious attention of a committee, instead of being brought thus hastily and secretly before the House. Mr. L. was proceeding in his remarks, when

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the orders of the day.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose to ask the general consent of the House to allow a memorial, on the Speaker's table, from the Bank of the United States, in connection with this subject, to be presented to the House. If this memorial was brought before the House it would supersede the necessity of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He would only add that the bank proposed to adopt the precise terms proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report.

The CHAIR then, by general consent, presented a memorial from the Directors of the Bank of the United States, stating that the intimation in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of their unwillingness to settle their accounts with the United States was not correct; that they were now ready and willing to accept the terms set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and to pay over the amount remaining due to the United States, reserving only enough of the dividends due by the bank to pay the expenses on the protested draft on France purchased by the bank from the Government.

This memorial was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

ARMY BILL.

The House then took up the amendments of the Senate to the "bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1837," which had been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments made thereto.

The first amendment of the committee to the Senate's amendment making an appropriation for equipping the militia, was concurred in.

Mr. TOUCEY then renewed the amendment made by him in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

"Appropriating $100,000 for the payment of the Connecticut militia called into the service during the last war, in the following cases: First, those called out to repel actual invasion. Secondly, those called out under State authority, and afterwards received into the service of the United States; and thirdly, where they were called out under the requisition of the President of the United States, or any other officer of the United States."

Mr. TOUCEY explained that this amendment was in conformity with the law paying the Massachusetts militia in like cases. The principle was well established, and he could not see on what grounds gentlemen could object to this amendment. The Government had admitted this principle in the case of the Massachusetts militia as much as seven years ago, and he appealed to gentlemen to grant the same justice to the militia of Connecticut.

Mr. LINCOLN said, at the last session of Congress a committee of the House had reported in favor of this claim, and hoped it might be adopted. He then intimated an intention of moving an amendment to this amendment when it should be in order to do so.

Mr. HARDIN opposed this claim, on the ground that Connecticut had received larger amounts of the money of the Government for fortifications and internal improvements, in proportion to her population, than perhaps any other State in the Union.

Mr. INGHAM said that, at the last session, Congress had given about $50,000 for improvements in Connecticut; but, prior to that, from the foundation of the Government, she had not received over twenty thousand dollars from the Government for improvements; and of this $50,000, in all probability one half of it would not be expended. He did not consider that a just claim should be rejected on such frivolous grounds as these, and hoped the House would not act on such narrow grounds as these. He went into a vindication of the conduct of the Connecticut militia during the last war, pointing out the important services rendered by them, and urged upon the House the justice of the claims of those troops.

Mr. MANN, of New York, remarked that the State of Connecticut was not asking a favor at the hands of the General Government, but a mere simple act of justice. She was fairly entitled to the claims she now set up, and similar claims had been heretofore paid. It was not long since that a claim of the same general character at least had been paid to the State of Georgia, due from the time of the revolution, amounting to between two and three hundred thousand dollars. Massachusetts, however, had been paid her claims under precisely similar circumstances, and based on the identical principles, to that of Connecticut. He was at a loss to perceive the justice of refusing this appropriation.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Connecticut, gave a history of the claim, and referred to the action of the Legislature of the State as an evidence of the feeling among the people on the subject. He also insisted that there was no incongruity in engraving it upon the present bill, for the separate bill would not be reached this session. It had been demonstrated by his colleague that Connecticut had received a very small pittance compared with others, and in reference to her geographical position on the seaboard, of the appropriations of the General Government, and all he would then add was that the history of the country showed that Connecticut had poured out her blood as freely, during the hour of peril, as any other State of the confederacy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD inquired if the proposed payment was intended to include those who fought and those who refused to muster under the authority of the United States, because he wished a distinction to be drawn.

Mr. TOUCEY replied, and showed the precise analogy between the cases of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

Mr. MCKAY would vote for it, not because he believed the claim to be a well founded one, and just in itself, but because it was identical with the precedent set in the case of Massachusetts.

The amendment of Mr. TOUCEY was then agreed to without a division.

Mr. MCKAY then renewed his amendment to pay the claims of North Carolina for the services of her militia during the late war with Great Britain, in the cases enumerated in the act approved the 31st of May, 1830, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts, for the services of her militia during the late war, and also the claims of said State for disbursements, &c. on account of the war," the sum of $30,000.

Mr. MCKAY briefly advocated the claim, on the ground of its being strictly analogous to that of Massachusetts.

Mr. MERCER was not satisfied that the analogy had been clearly made out.

Mr. OWENS inquired if it had undergone investigation by any committee of the House?

Mr. MCKAY replied that it had been submitted to the Committee of Claims during the last session, but no report had been made.

Mr. PARKER objected to this mode, which had too much prevailed in the Senate, of engraving amendments upon bills with which they had no necessary connection. It was a practice he had always disapproved of, and which he would never sanction.

The amendment of Mr. MCKAY was then agreed to—ayes 86, noes not counted.

Mr. DUNLAP offered the following amendment, originally submitted by him in Committee of the Whole, "And be it further enacted, That the volunteers in the State of Tennessee, who equipped themselves, and marched to the place of rendezvous, and tendered their services, according to the proclamation of the Governor of said State in the year 1826, and were not received into the service of the United States, be paid the same by the Paymaster General that is allowed by this act to be paid to those volunteers who were received into the service of the United States, and immediately discharged, on the commandments of the companies thus refused, returning, on oath, to the Secretary of War, complete returns of the number of officers and men in their respective companies, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. DUNLAP said if the members of the House would but examine the claims of those intended to be provided for by the amendment he had just offered, he had no doubt they would with equal liberality vote for his amendment. The facts are these. The Governor of Tennessee was called on by General Gaines and the Secretary of War, during the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, for volunteers at different periods, and the Governor issued a proclamation, calling on the citizens of Tennessee to volunteer at their services, and rendezvous at Fayetteville, in West Tennessee, and Athens, in East Tennessee, mounted and equipped, to perform a six or twelve months' campaign. There rendezvoused at those places of rendezvous more volunteers than were called for by the Secretary of War, and only a portion of them were received and mustered into service: the remainder of them, that had marched from one to two hundred miles at their own expense, who were at all the expense of purchasing horses and clothing, for a campaign of six and twelve months, had to return home at their own expense, without ever having received one cent for their expenses or services. Now, sir, the class provided for in the bill are those who marched to the place of rendezvous under the call of General Gaines, and were mustered into the service of the United States, and immediately discharged. They receive by this bill pay for six months' clothing, amounting to about thirty four dollars each. There has not been the first voice heard on this floor against paying this last class of volunteers; and I would like any gentleman to show why one of those class of volunteers should be paid, and the others not: they were alike meritorious and patriotic, and they were at the like expense of purchasing horses and clothing. The expenses of those who were received into service were paid, and those who were not received had to pay their own expenses. If there ever was a claim that ought to be paid, Mr. Speaker, this is one. The patriotism of the citizens of Tennessee was called on by the Executive of the State, and if Congress refuses to remunerate the patriot citizens who thus marched to the standard of their country, you may call in vain for services hereafter. They will not know whether they would be received, and if they should not, they must be at the expense of equipping and supporting themselves, without the least prospect of receiving any compensation from their Government for all the expense they would necessarily incur. Sir, if this Government wishes the services of her citizens in time of war, they must act with justice towards them, and let them know that if more of them tender their services than are required, those who are not received, shall be paid at their own expense.

Mr. HUNTSMAN then addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I solicit the attention of the House to a amendment proposed by my colleague (Mr. Dunlap), which contemplates the payment of those Tennessee volunteers who marched to the place of rendezvous, and were not received into the service of the United States. These troops promptly assembled at their country's call; they incurred considerable expense in procuring such horses, rifles, clothing, and equipments essential for the Florida campaign, and marched some of them, upwards of two hundred miles to the place of rendezvous at Fayetteville, in Tennessee, with an intent to do battle against the enemies of their country. They had no Constitutional scruples in regard to passing boundary lines: all they desired to know was, where were the enemies of their country; for with the enemy the business was to settle; they were some of the same men who marched to Florida, Pensacola, and to Orleans during the last war. And as to those hardy sons of the west, all they ever want to know, on such occasions, is, that the Government needs their services, and, one thing more, where are the enemies to be found? Be it in the east or the west, the north or the south, be it by land or water, they are, and always have been, ready to march, at a moment's warning, to meet the enemy. This is a spirit of chivalry that ought to be encouraged instead of being repressed. What is the case before us? these troops, with the most patriotic motives, repaired to the place assigned; but some arrived in the morning, some at mid-day, and some at night.

The patriotism which burns in the bosom of every Tennesseean brought more to the place of rendezvous, than the number required by the Government, and those who happened to arrive at the ground first in the morning, were received into the service, and discharged; those who arrived in the evening were bill two years ago? He repeated that he did apprehend the loss of the bill if this measure should be engrafed on it, and he appealed to honorable gentlemen not to do that by an indirect vote which they would spurn to do directly; for an affirmation of the decision of the Chair, and the subsequent adoption of the amendment would, he insisted, be virtually a vote against the bill itself.

One word as to the principle involved in the measure itself, and Mr. W. would take his seat, for the opportunity had gone by when long speeches could be made. He was opposed to the scheme of distribution as provided for by the amendment. He had opposed it at the last session, and recorded his vote against it; and he never had, nor did he believe he ever should have, cause to regret that vote. A majority of that House was of a different opinion, and Mr. W. was compelled to yield, after doing all that the Constitution empowered him to do, to arrest its passage—that of recording his vote in the negative. In conclusion, he again made an earnest appeal to the House to reverse the decision of the Chair, for by that alone could they insure the passage of the appropriation bills for the necessary wants of the Government. Should the House affirm the decision of the Chair, and then vote down the amendment, its friends, under that decision, would renew it on the other appropriation bills, and one or all of them would be inevitably lost. Mr. W. here enumerated some of the more important bills, among which were, besides the fortification bill, the harbor bill, the civil and diplomatic bill, the Cumberland road bill, &c. For these reasons, thus hastily expressed, Mr. W. should vote to reverse that decision; and he sincerely hoped that, in that vote, he would meet with the support of a majority of the House.

After some remarks from Messrs. PATTON, JOHNSON of Ia. and HAYNES,

Mr. VANDERPOEL renewed the call for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The point was then further discussed by Messrs. MERCER, PARKER, and REED.

The question was taken on the appeal, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 97.

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Bockee, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Canbreleng, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. So the House reversed the decision of the Chair.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. MARTIN then submitted the following amendment to the amendment:

“That the sales of the public lands shall cease from and after the passage of this bill, except to actual settlers upon the public land, upon such rules and regulations as shall be presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and which shall not be inconsistent with the following instructions:

“1st. That no one settler shall purchase a larger quantity than two sections.

“2d. That two years' residence upon the land, after the purchase, shall be necessary, and shall be satisfactorily proven to the Secretary of the Treasury before the patent issues.

“3d. That the price of the public lands to the settler shall be regulated as follows: To the purchaser of a quantity of land not exceeding one quarter section, fifty cents per acre; not exceeding one half section, seventy-five cents per acre; and to the purchaser of a section or more, one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre.”

The CHAIR decided this amendment to be out of order.

Mr. MARTIN appealed from the decision of the Chair, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 112, nays 70, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Anthony, Bailey, Barton, Beale, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chetwood, Childs, N. Mason, McKay, McKim, Moore, Morgan, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Phelps, Pinckney, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Seymour, Shian, Sickles, John Thomson, Toucey, Turill, Vanderpoel, and Yell,—70.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed by the House.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means, as amended by Mr. BELL, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 84.

So the amendment as amended, was concurred in.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the committee for fortifications at the mouth of Connecticut river. After a few remarks by Messrs. MCKAY and INGHAM, the amendment was non-concurred in.

The question then recurred on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

After some remarks by Mr. PATTON, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 70.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MANN of New York moved an adjournment: lost.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House, the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a letter from the Secretary of War ad interim, accompanied by various documents, in relation to a survey, recently made of the mouths of the Mississippi river, under a law of the last session of Congress.

ANDREW JACKSON.

FEBRUARY 24, 1837.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, the message was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of the names of inventors of useful improvements who had had their improvements patented during the year 1836; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of the patents which have expired during the year 1836; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion,

The House then adjourned at ten o'clock, P. M.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 27, 1837.

The CHAIR presented a communication from the State Department, transmitting a list of the patents which expired within the year 1836; which, on motion of Mr. KNIGHT, was ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department in relation to the harbor at Milwaukee; which, on motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 23d instant, transmitting a communication from the Solicitor of the Treasury, with the accompanying documents and correspondence called for.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, the documents and correspondence were ordered to be printed.

Mr. FULTON presented the credentials of the Hon. ANDREW H. SEVIER, appointed a Senator, by the Governor of Arkansas, to fill the vacancy that will occur on the 4th of March next, for the term of six years.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed his doubts as to the constitutionality of making an appointment, no vacancy having occurred.

Mr. FULTON remarked that he and his colleague were aware of this difficulty; but he (Mr. F.) supposing that it would be a matter for the next Senate to act upon, presented the credentials under that impression.

The CHAIR said that it was not for the Senate to consider the qualifications of Senators elected to the next Congress. That Congress must act on this subject.

Mr. SEVIER said that he had very great doubt of the legality of the appointment, and did not at all doubt the patriotic motives which influenced the Senator from Massachusetts in expressing himself as he had done. Mr. S. cared not how the matter should be decided, one way or the other.

Mr. WEBSTER was sure that the honorable Senator was very indifferent as to how the question might be decided, and would give him credit as to his motives in intimating that there might be some irregularity in the proceeding.

Mr. SEVIER expressed himself quite satisfied with the course pursued by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of a number of merchants of Apalachicola, praying Congress to confirm an act passed by the Legislature of Florida, incorporating the Marine Insurance Company Bank; which was referred.

Mr. KENT presented the credentials of the Hon. JOHN S. SPENCER, re-elected by the Legislature of Maryland, a Senator from that State, for the term of six years from the 4th of March next.

Mr. MORRIS presented the memorial of the General Assembly of Ohio, praying that Congress may cede to the State a strip of land on the south side of the same; which was referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a number of memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. B. moved to dispense with the reading of the same, and that they be laid on the table.

Mr. LINN objected to their reception.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the motion of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. SWIFT and Mr. MORRIS presented petitions on the same subject, which were similarly disposed of.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, relative to the disposition of the stock, reported a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept the terms proposed by the President and Directors of the bank, under the Pennsylvania charter, in relation to the purchase of the capital stock, and final adjustment of claims of the Government; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and the correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the chairman of the committee on the same subject, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to establish a collection district in the State of Mississippi; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution, authorizing the purchase of 30,000 copies of General Macomb's work on military tactics; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the building of light houses, life boats, the erection of buoys, beacons, &c.; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WEBSTER, for printing certain opinions of the Attorney General, and circulars of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on the subject of the public lands, was read the second time, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the House, making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States for the year 1837, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed.

The bill making an appropriation for certain roads in the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill to create two additional land offices in that part of the Territory of Wisconsin west of the Mississippi river.

The bill to create the office of surveyor of the public lands for the Territory of Wisconsin.

The bill for the relief of Catharine Myer.

The bill supplementary to the act granting half pay to the widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States;

The bill to authorize and sanction the sales of reserves provided for Creek Indians by the treaty of March, 1833, in certain cases, and for other purposes.

The bill to amend the act for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, and others in the Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

The bill giving the approval and confirmation of Congress to three several acts of the Territorial Legislature of Wisconsin incorporating banks.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to take up the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of our relations with Mexico; and

Mr. WALKER hoped that the resolution submitted by him for the acknowledgement of the independence of Texas, more than two months ago, and which had been so often postponed to make way for other matters, would have the precedence.

After some remarks from Messrs. PRESTON, CALHOUN, BUCHANAN, and WALKER,

The CHAIR said that the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations had come up in its regular order, and must be first considered, unless postponed by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON moved to postpone the resolution, for the purpose of taking up the resolution on the subject of the acknowledgement of the independence of Texas; which motion was negatived—yeas 9, nays not counted.

Mr. CLAY rose and said, that he supposed the only question which would be presented to the Senate, would be upon the resolution. He had risen merely to say, that he concurred with the other gentlemen who composed the committee upon the subject under consideration. He agreed with the rest of his colleagues that the controversy with Mexico had made out no case justifying a resort to war, or for the issuing of reprisals; and he thought that renewed efforts should be made to obtain redress, before it should become necessary to declare war against Mexico to vindicate the honor and interests of the country.

He felt himself bound to say that whilst he concurred with the committee, which he believed was unanimous in adopting the resolution, he did not agree entirely with the body of the report. He thought the case was made out rather stronger against Mexico than the correspondence of the Government with that country justified. And he must say, in all candor and truth, that the departure of our representative from Mexico, under the circumstances, was harsh, abrupt, and unnecessary. A long letter had been addressed, in pursuance of instructions from the Department of State, by the American Charge d'Affaires, to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Mexico, and which bore date some time in December last, and embraced a great variety of claims in respect to which information was to be procured, and procured, too, from remote parts of Mexico. Some delay, in consequence, took place, on the part of the Mexican Minister, in sending his reply to our Charge d'Affaires.

When we came to examine the reply, with candor and fairness, in respect to which some of our claims were admitted, and concerning others, more information was required, the Senate would think, he presumed, that there had been more precipitation than was necessary on the part of our Minister. Well, it was in this state of things that he shortly after demanded his passports and came home.

Now he (Mr. C.) thought that such were the circumstances then existing, that our Charge might have waited further instructions; and, if he had delayed his departure, the Mexican Government would probably have been able to furnish him with further information. He would have heard what they thought of the letter from our Secretary of State relative to the final disposition of our Government in regard to the occupation of the Mexican territory near the Sabine, and which had occasioned so much unpleasantness.

While up, Mr. C. would take the opportunity of saying, that he did not concur in all the reasonings of the committee as to the publication of a pamphlet by Mr. Gorostiza, the Mexican Envoy Extraordinary. He (Mr. C.) however, would say that it was a great diplomatic irregularity; but he did not think it made out a case for war, or for any serious disturbance. It was not an unusual case. He recollected an instance which occurred while the American Commissioners were at Ghent, in 1814, at a most critical state of the negotiation—when it hung, as it were, on a balance, and when it was extremely doubtful whether there would not be a rupture.

Mr. C. here related, that while he was at Ghent, treating with Lord Gambier and the other British commissioners, a publication from the United States, containing the correspondence between the Government of the United States and Great Britain, found its way there. Lord Gambier having seen it, expressed his surprise to Mr. C. that his Government should have given publicity to this correspondence, and said he could not see how they could justify the act. The other commissioners were equally displeased at the occurrence. Mr. C. then explained to them that the occurrence which had been adopted, was one growing out of the peculiar structure of this Government, and which the people here demanded of their servants.

He (Mr. C.) mentioned this to show that what Mr. Gorostiza had done, was a thing not unexampled. It would be recollected that but the other day, Mr. Pageot, just before embarking for France from New York, published the letter of the Duc de Broglie. Mr. Pageot had since returned to this country and been received friskily, and without any intimation of dissatisfaction on the part of our Government. And he (Mr. C.) had no more doubt of the fact than of his standing on that floor at that moment, that there had been information conveyed through some channel, official, or unofficial, to France that Mr. Pageot's return to the United States would be welcomed, without any displeasure being shown towards him in regard to his having published the letter of the Duc de Broglie; otherwise the French Government would not have sent him to this country. Had Mr. Gorostiza not known the fact of this publication, he probably would not have pursued the course set him.

Mr. C. admitted that Mr. Gorostiza's conduct in publishing the pamphlet he did, was decidedly wrong; and highly reprehensible; but, as he had before said, it was not, in his opinion, an offence justifying war. The pamphlet had produced no impression, and had done no mischief; and he thought the Secretary of State had acted highly wrong to make it a subject of communication to the Mexican Government. Whilst, however, Mr. C. disagreed with the committee as to some parts of the report, he concurred entirely with them in regard to the resolution, and hoped it would obtain the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had but a few remarks to make upon this subject, in addition to those contained in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He felt gratified that the Senator from Kentucky had concurred with the other members of the committee in a large portion of their report, and that he would sustain the resolution with which it concluded.

The justice of the Senator's remarks in regard to the withdrawal of Mr. Ellis from Mexico would be palpable, if no demand had ever been made upon the Mexican Government for the redress of our grievances previous to his letter of September, 1836, to Mr. Monasterio. But the case was far different. This demand was not then made for the first time. On the contrary, year after year, time after time, whenever we sustained injuries, we had asked for redress; but our reclamations, in almost every instance, had been evaded, and redress had been withheld. Mr. Ellis's letter of the 26th September was, therefore, but a mere summing up of our causes of complaint—an enumeration of demands which had been previously made against the Mexican Government. That Government ought to have been prepared to yield us prompt redress, or at least to have expressed their willingness to do so, as soon as they possibly could. He thought Mr. Ellis, in withdrawing from Mexico, had obeyed his instructions, both in the spirit and in the letter. His opinion upon this point was very decided.

He should not have said another word upon the subject, but for a commentary on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, which had appeared in a morning paper. This article proceeded from a source which seemed to render a passing notice of it necessary.

The President, in his message, after expressing his opinion of the aggravated wrongs which we had suffered from Mexico, in which the committee entirely concurred, recommended that an act should be passed authorizing reprisals, if, after making another demand, the Mexican Government should refuse to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy. He expressed his entire willingness, however, to co-operate with Congress in any other course which should be deemed honorable and proper.

Under any circumstances it was a matter of extreme delicacy for Congress to confer upon the Executive the power of making reprisals, upon a future contingency. He would not say that cases might not occur which would justify such a proceeding. These, if they should ever happen, would establish a rule for themselves. Unless an immediate and overruling necessity existed, which could brook no delay, it was always safer and more constitutional, to take the opinion of Congress upon events after they had happened, than to entrust a power so important to the President alone.

The committee, under all the circumstances, did not believe that our existing relations with Mexico presented such a case. They knew that General Santa Anna, whose life had been justly forfeited, but had been restored to him by the magnanimity of the Government of Texas, had recently arrived at Washington; that he had been sent home in a Government vessel of the United States; and that there was every reason to believe his arrival would be hailed by the Mexicans with joy, and that he would shortly be restored to the Presidency of the Republic. Under such circumstances, it was but reasonable to hope that he would feel disposed to render to this country the justice which was our due; and that, therefore, it was neither expedient nor necessary, at the present moment, to authorize any decisive measure of a hostile character.

Again: The committee were unanimously of opinion that the 34th article of our treaty with Mexico required that a demand should be made, under its provisions, before resorting either to war or to reprisals. This article was one of a peculiar nature. It might have been impolitic to agree to it at first; but it was now a part of our treaty, and its requisitions must be held sacred. Here Mr. B. read from the article, as follows: "If (what indeed cannot be expected,) any of the articles contained in the present treaty shall be violated or infringed in any manner whatever, it is stipulated that neither of the contracting parties will order or authorize any acts of reprisal, nor declare war against the other, on complaints of injuries or damages, until the said party considering itself offended, shall first have presented to the other a statement of such injuries or damages, verified by competent proofs, and demanded justice and satisfaction, and the same shall have been either refused or unreasonably delayed."

This language was too plain to be misunderstood. It was true that it did not extend to direct insults to the national honor; such as violations of our flag, or opprobrious and injurious conduct towards our consuls. But the committee were very clear and unanimous in their opinion, that when pecuniary damages were sought by our citizens, for pecuniary injuries sustained, in violation of any article of the treaty, before we could redress those injuries by reprisals, a previous demand must be made in pursuance of its provisions. On this point, there could scarcely be two opinions.

This treaty required something more than a mere presentation of the complaints of individuals to the Mexican Government through the agency of our Minister to Mexico. Our Government must be the judge, in the first instance, of the injuries requiring redress. We must decide this question ourselves. We are then bound to present a statement of such injuries and damages to the Mexican Government, verified by competent proofs. That such a demand under the treaty had never been made hitherto, must be apparent to all those who have read the correspondence. Throughout the whole of it, this article does not seem to have attracted any attention. That it was not within the contemplation of Mr. Forsyth, when he addressed the letter of instructions to Mr. Ellis of the 20th of July last, will appear conclusively from that letter itself. After enumerating our causes of complaint against the Mexican Government, he says, "though the department is not in possession of proof of all the circumstances of the wrongs done in the above cases, as represented by the aggrieved parties, yet the complaints are such as to entitle them to be listened to, and to justify a demand on the Mexican Government that they shall be promptly and properly examined, and that suitable redress shall be afforded."

The committee believed that it would require several months to enable the Department of State to collect the necessary proofs for the purpose of verifying each of the private claims of our citizens, and to make the demand according to the treaty. All the necessary forms can probably not be complied with until within two or three months of the meeting of the next Congress. They, therefore, thought it much better to wait this brief space, and refer the whole question to Congress, than to authorize the President immediately to issue letters of marque and reprisal, in case the answer of the Mexican Government should not prove satisfactory.

After this demand shall have been made, and the answer of the Mexican Government received, the whole case will then be before Congress in a clear and distinct form. If that Government should refuse to do us justice, he could not doubt but that Congress would adopt prompt measures for vindicating the honor of the American flag, and asserting the just rights of our injured fellow-citizens.

He should have been willing to use stronger language in the resolution appended to the report, but he believed it was now presented in the best form. Whilst negotiation continued, it was not politic to use the language of menace. Still he thought, from the report and the resolution taken together, the Mexican Government could not fail to perceive the determination of that of the United States to enforce, in the most prompt and energetic manner, the redress of all our grievances.

The report of the committee was concurred in unanimously—yeas 46.

Mr. WALKER then moved to take up the resolution submitted by him for the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; which motion was supported by Mr. PRESTON, and opposed by Mr. HUBBARD; after which the resolution was taken up; and

Mr. HUBBARD moved to postpone it till Wednesday next; which was agreed to—yeas 25, nays 21, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, February 27, 1837.

This being the day for presenting petitions and memorials, Mr. CAMBRELENG, advising to that fact, remarked that two days only remained of the session in which bills could be sent to the Senate, and as to memorials it had been heretofore the custom, by a general order, to permit members to lay them on the table. Every one knew that it was unnecessary to present petitions at this time, for no action could be had on them. Mr. C. therefore moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. LINCOLN asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House: lost.

The rules were suspended—yeas 112, nays 21.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire in the Chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the committee take up the "harbor bill."

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the committee would first take up the "civil list bill;" but the first motion prevailed—yeas 76, nays 65.

HARBOR BILL.

The committee accordingly took up the "bill to provide for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, during the year 1837."

The bill, having been read, was taken up by sections.

Mr. CHAPIN proposed an item of $7,500 for the completion of the works at the harbor of Buffalo, New York.

After some remarks in its support by Mr. C. (which will be given hereafter) against it by Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, (on the ground of its not having been recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means,) and by Messrs. SMITH, MERCER, SUTHERLAND and GIDEON LEE, the amendment was disagreed to without a division.

Mr. HARD moved to increase the clause for continuing the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Oak Orchard creek, New York, from $5000 to $10,000, and briefly supported the amendment on the ground that the smaller amount, being insufficient, would be less economical than the larger amount.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER submitted an amendment proposing an appropriation of $6,966 in addition to the unexpended balance of last year, for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Brunswick, New Jersey. Lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to increase the item for continuing the removal of obstructions at Ocracoke inlet, North Carolina, from $12,050 to $13,850, and read the letter of the engineer asking for the increase. Lost.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky moved an amendment to form a collection district and port of entry at Shippensport, mouth of Laurel river, Kentucky, and also making an appropriation of $45,000 for the improvement of said river, in accordance with the plan of Col. Abert, &c.

After some remarks, from Messrs WHITE, GIDEON LEE, E. WHITTLESEY, S. WILLIAMS, MERCER, SMITH and CHAMBERS of Kentucky, the amendment was disagreed to: yeas 67, nays 59.

Mr. CARTER moved an amendment appropriating $50,000 to continue the improvements heretofore commenced at Muelle Shoals, and to declare Kingsport a port of entry.

After some remarks by Messrs. CARTER, CAMBRELENG and BELL, the amendment was disagreed to, without a division.

Mr. CASEY moved an amendment, making an appropriation for the improvement of the Illinois and Great Wabash river, $40,000; and for the establishment of a port of entry at some point thereon: lost.

Mr. YELL moved an amendment appropriating $20,000 for the removal of obstructions in the Arkansas river, from Little Rock to Fort Smith.

After a few remarks by Mr. YELL, the amendment was disagreed to without division.

Mr. YELL then moved a further amendment, appropriating $30,000 for the removal of obstructions in White and Black river, and $10,000 for improvements in St. Francis river: lost.

Mr. DAWSON then moved an amendment, appropriating $25,000 for the improvement of the harbor of Brunswick, Georgia, and declaring that place a port of entry.

After some remarks by Messrs. DAWSON, SUTHERLAND, PINCKNEY, MANN, of New York, PEARCE, of Rhode Island, Mr. DAWSON withdrew his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, proposed an additional clause, appropriating $210,000 for continuing the works of the removal of obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river and its mouth, which after some remarks from the honorable mover, and Messrs. PEARCE, of R. I. GARLAND, of La. VANDER-POEL, SMITH, REED, LAWRENCE, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved an amendment appropriating $50,000 for the improvement of the Great Wabash river, and declaring Delphi a port of entry.

After some remarks, by Messrs. HANNEGAN and MER-CLER, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GRAYSON moved an amendment, appropriating $10,000 for the surveys of certain rivers and creeks between Charleston, South Carolina, and Savannah, Georgia.

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAYSON, OWENS, SUTHERLAND, and PINCKNEY the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH submitted an amendment explanatory of an appropriation for works at New Bedford, Massachusetts, last year, which was agreed to.

Mr. DENNY proposed an item of $3,000 for placing buoys in the Ohio above Louisville: lost.

Mr. HARRISON of Missouri moved an item of $2,000 for continuing the surveys of the St. Francis, Black, and White rivers in the States of Arkansas and Missouri, which, after a few words from the mover and Mr. YELL, was rejected.

Mr. REED submitted an item of $5,000 for the improvement of the harbor of Provincetown, Massachusetts, which after a few words in its support by the mover, by Mr. SMITH against it, and by Mr. R. in rejoinder, was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to increase the item for continuing the improvement of the harbor of Wilmington, Delaware, from $5,000 to $15,000. Lost.

Mr. INGER-SOLL moved to increase the item for continuing the repairs at the harbor of Chester, Pennsylvania, from $500 to $2,000: agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN moved an appropriation of $100,000 for continuing the improvement of the Muscle and Colbert Shoals, to be expended under the direction of commissioners appointed by the State of Alabama, which, after some remarks from Messrs. MARTIN and CHAPMAN, was disagreed to.

Mr. GHOLSON moved an appropriation of $100,000, to remove obstructions on the Tombigbee river; and also on the Yallahoussa, &c.; which, after some remarks from Messrs. GHOLSON and DAWSON, was disagreed to.

Mr. WISE moved two items of $500 each, for placing buoys on some points therein named, upon the Atlantic coast of Virginia, and Eastern shore of the Chesapeake; which after some remarks from Messrs. WISE, P. WHITTLESEY, SMITH, SUTHERLAND, BELL, and HARPER, was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out the clause "for opening a passage of fifty yards wide and seven feet deep, at low water, between the town of Beaufort and Pamlico sound, North Carolina; and for improving New river, in addition to two sums of $5,000 each, appropriated at the last session of Congress for the harbor of Beaufort, and for New river, $20,000."

The hour of 3 having arrived, the committee rose, and, pursuant to order, the House took a recess till half past 4 o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

The House re-assembled at half past four o'clock, P. M. and went into Committee of the Whole, resuming the consideration of the "harbor bill."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD to strike from the bill the following clause:

"For opening a passage of fifty yards wide and seven feet deep, at low water, between the town of Beaufort and Pamlico sound, North Carolina, and for improving New river, in addition to two sums of $5,000 each, appropriated at the last session of Congress for the harbor of Beaufort, and for New river, $20,000."

After some remarks from Messrs. UNDERWOOD, McKAY, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HARPER then moved to strike out the clause appropriating $15,000 for continuing the improvement of the harbor at Baltimore.

Mr. H. briefly supported his amendment, and adverted to the fact that the citizens of Philadelphia bore themselves the expense of clearing out their harbor, was at a loss, he said, to see why Baltimore should be so much more favored.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. SMITH briefly replied to Mr. HARPER.

Mr. HOWARD said, that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had allowed himself to reflect for a few moments, he must have perceived that he was the last man in the House who ought to have made this motion. Between the cities, which they respectively represented, there had long been, and still was, an active commercial competition, but conducted upon liberal and fair principles. The people of Baltimore had resorted to every expedient to extend the advantages flowing from their geographical position; and had kept their harbor open this winter by means of an ice-bat, an invention of their own; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania would find that his people were so deeply impressed with the necessity of counteracting this step, that they were about to do the same thing. This motion would, if successful, very much cripple the commerce of Baltimore; and would be said, by those less charitable than he (Mr. Howard) was, to proceed from a narrow jealousy, which he was sure neither the gentleman nor his constituents felt. But unkind persons would so construe it, and he begged leave to say that, upon this subject, the colleague of the gentleman (Mr. Sutherland) who had introduced this bill at the last session, and ought to be considered a more appropriate representative of the feelings of Philadelphia than the author of the pending motion.

If the gentleman would exchange his magnificent river and flowing tides, which swept so nobly along in front of his wharves, for the land-locked harbor of Baltimore, he might be welcome to this appropriation. But the peculiar position of Baltimore had attracted the attention of Congress sooner than any other harbor in the United States; for in 1791, an act of Congress was passed assenting to the imposition of a small tax upon tonnage, for the express purpose of keeping the harbor clear. But its product was so inconsiderable that the State had permitted the city to apply a valuable fund in aid of it, amounting to 20, 25, or $30,000 a year. This fund had been temporarily withdrawn, under circumstances which had no sort of connection with the question before the House. It was sufficient to know that it was withdrawn, and whilst harbors, great and small, were receiving the care of Government, it was not to be supposed that a port of such nature as Baltimore could be overlooked. There were many other considerations connected with the subject, but the time of the House ought to be now counted by minutes, and he would therefore consume no more of it.

The motion was then rejected without a division.

Mr. LYON moved to strike out "twenty thousand," and insert fifty thousand, so as to increase the appropriation for improving the navigation of the Mobile bay, by deepening the channel across Dog river bar and Manlaw pass.

Mr. L. said he did not intend to consume the time of the House by a speech at the present stage of the session, but he begged to make a brief statement of facts in support of the motion, he had submitted. He requested that the clerk might read a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Mobile, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Mobile bay: [which was done.]

It would be seen, continued Mr. L. from the document just read, that the value of the exports of cotton alone, from Mobile, was estimated, for the present year, at twenty millions of dollars, and the number of vessels that discharge and receive cargoes, at not less than five hundred. All vessels drawing over ten feet of water were obliged to remain below Dog river bar or anchor in the bay, a distance of 15 or 20 miles from the city of Mobile, and had to discharge their cargoes, and receive their return freights, with the aid of lighters. The obstruction to the navigation, interposed by Dog river bar, subjected persons, engaged in commercial pursuits, and in the navigation of the bay, to much inconvenience, delay, and expense. A very intelligent officer of the Engineer Corps, Capt. Chase, had, in his report, estimated the cost of deepening the channel across the bar, so as to admit vessels drawing 12 feet of water, at $150,000, and had expressed the opinion that the improvement when completed would be permanent. Mr. L. begged that the report from the Engineer Department might be read by the Clerk. He said he feared the small sum of $20,000 proposed in the bill, would not be sufficient to make all the necessary preparations for the commencement of the work, and leave on hand a sum sufficient to enable much progress to be made in deepening the channel across the bar. The improvement contemplated was one of much consequence to the people of Alabama, and parts of Mississippi and Georgia; and he hoped he was not asking too much in proposing to appropriate at the present time one-third of the estimated cost of the work. With an appropriation of $50,000 every necessary preparation could be at once made, and the work commenced with a prospect of its early completion. It had heretofore been commenced, but the amount appropriated had been so small that little or no progress, he believed, had been made. It was no doubt, (said Mr. L.) the intention of Congress to complete an improvement already commenced, and known to be essentially important; and he hoped his proposition to increase the appropriation might prevail.

Mr. GHOLSON and Mr. SUTHERLAND made a few remarks in support of the amendment, when it was agreed to—ayes 64, noes 61.

Mr. GRAVES then moved the following amendment, which he supported by a statement of the great importance of this work to the commerce of the whole western States, twelve of which were directly interested:

"And be it further enacted, That all the tolls that have been, and shall hereafter be, received by the Government upon the stock which it now owns, or may hereafter acquire, in the Louisville and Portland Canal, be appropriated by the Secretary of the Treasury to purchasing up the individual stock in said canal, on such terms as he may think best; and that when all the stock in the said canal shall be thus acquired by the Government of the United States, and the amount hereby appropriated shall be refunded to the Government, that tolls thereon shall be so reduced as barely to defray the expenses of superintending, repairing, and enlarging of said canal, so as to answer the purposes of the commerce of the river Ohio."

"And be it further enacted, That $25,000 be, and are hereby, appropriated for purchasing up the individual stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, to purchase up so much of said individual stock as he can procure for the sum hereby appropriated: Provided, however, That he shall not pay a greater price than fifteen per cent. advance upon the par value of said stock."

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, CAMBRELENG, PEARCE of Rhode Island, and FRENCH,

Mr. STORER moved a proviso that a survey should be first made, to ascertain whether the canal was substantially built, and capable of passing all the steamboats which navigate the western waters; which was disagreed to; and then,

The amendment of Mr. GRAVES was disagreed to—ayes 49, noes 54.

Mr. CASEY moved an amendment for a survey, and estimate for the removal of obstructions in the Illinois and Kaskaskia rivers, $5,000: lost.

Mr. CRANE moved an amendment for the improvement of the Miami of Lake Erie, $20,000: lost.

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi moved the following: "For a continuation of the survey of the Mississippi sea-coast from the Rigolets to Mobile Point, including the mouths of Pearl and Pascagoula rivers, three thousand dollars."

Mr. C. said that he would not detain the committee—at this late hour, when the time of the House was as valuable as it was limited. A survey of this interesting seaboard had already been ordered upon his motion, and he now moved an additional appropriation in the event of the former proving inadequate. His sole object, in brief, was to direct public attention to that part of the State of Mississippi; a section heretofore unknown, and little appreciated; but which in every point of view deserved the attention of Government. He had on a former occasion, when the House had ordered a reconnaissance of the coast, expressed his views at length, and he would now merely express a hope that the report of the officer detailed for the service would, at the next session of Congress, be followed up by liberal appropriations to improve the fine harbors between the Rigolets and Mobile Point.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee take up the civil and diplomatic bill, including the appropriation to pay the members themselves.

Mr. MERCER moved to take up the Cumberland road bill. The former motion taking precedence, was put and agreed to—ayes 53, noes 59.

CIVIL LIST BILL.

So the committee took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1837."

The bill having been read through, was then taken up by sections.

The enacting clause having been read; Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved the following amendment:

"For the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to be sent to the independent republic of Texas, ———— thousand dollars."

"For the expenses of running the boundary line between the United States and the independent Government of Texas ———— thousand dollars; the line to be run by commissioners to be appointed by the United States and the republic of Texas."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON inquired if it was in order to submit the amendment at that part of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON said it was as much in order there as any where.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that it was clearly in order.

The CHAIR (Mr. F. PEARCE) replied that it was strictly in order.

Mr. THOMPSON then addressed the committee at some length in support of his amendment, and Mr. MASON of Ohio and HOWAR, in reply.

Mr. BYNUM addressed the House at length in support of the amendment; and without concluding, gave way to

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina, who moved that the committee rise; and the question being taken by tellers, the vote was ayes 26, noes 36, no quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON then moved that the committee rise and report that fact to the House; which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, and the chairman having reported the fact that the committee had found itself without a quorum,

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 50, nays 105.

The House again went into committee at 10 o'clock, P. M. and—

Mr. BYNUM concluded his remarks.

Mr. HUNTSMAN then took the floor, and addressed the House at some length in support of the amendment, and

The question was then taken thereon and disagreed to, ayes 40, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGER-SOLL moved that the committee rise, and the vote being ayes 7, noes 101, no quorum—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there was doubtless a quorum in the hall, from the preceding vote, and he hoped the committee would, by general consent, agree to report the bill to the House. He had no amendments to offer, and any reductions of the appropriations might be made in the House.

The CHAIR then directed the House to be counted, and one hundred and twenty-five members (a quorum) were found to be within the hall.

Mr. BYNUM moved that the committee rise, and the vote being—ayes 10, noes 105, still no quorum.

Mr. PARKS said he would assert that the gentleman who made the motion, that the committee rise, and insisted upon dividing the House, had not himself voted either one way or the other.

The committee then rose, and the SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, the chairman of the committee reported the fact to the House of their finding themselves without a quorum.

Mr. PARKS moved a call of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD would suggest to the gentleman from Maine, towards whom he had the kindest feelings, that it would be better, he thought, not to press that motion at so late an hour, but to adjourn. [It was then half past 12 o'clock.]

Mr. PARKS. Would the gentleman allow him to make one observation? He would make this declaration from his own knowledge, that when the committee divided by tellers, on the motion to rise, the gentleman who made the motion—

The CHAIR interposed, and reminded the gentleman that this was not a debatable motion.

Mr. DOVER-REID said it was a question of privilege.

Mr. CALHOUN of Kentucky moved that the House adjourn, Mr. HANNEGAN asked for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was lost—ayes 25, noes 95; but no quorum voting.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved a call of the House, which was ordered; and, after proceeding a few minutes,

Mr. ELMORE moved to dispense with all further proceedings thereon: lost.

The roll having been gone through, and 124 members answering to their names.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the House adjourn: lost—ayes 37, noes 78.

The doors of the hall were then closed, and excuses having been rendered for a number of absent members, on account of indisposition.

Mr. STORER (at half past one) moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call: lost without a division.

After proceeding some time further in rendering excuses,

Mr. PARKS moved the execution of the 51st rule of the House, which orders, at this stage, the absent members "for whom no excuse, or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose."

Mr. UNDERWOOD suggested that if that rule should be enforced, a great deal of time must necessarily be wasted in waking up the members, and bringing them to the House; and though he was anxious to expedite the public business as any one, he really thought nothing would be gained by enforcing this rule. He, therefore, moved an adjournment: lost, yeas 43, nays 61.

The motion of Mr. PARKS to enforce the rule was then agreed to without a division.

The SPEAKER then directed the Sergeant-at-arms to proceed to the execution of the duty above, and to employ as many assistants as might be necessary.

Mr. WISE moved to dispense with the further proceedings in the call: lost.

Mr. MCKAY said, understanding that there was a quorum within the hall, 124 members having answered to their names, he moved to reconsider the vote by which the Sergeant-at-arms had been directed to execute the order.

Mr. LEWIS hoped the motion would not prevail; for those who could come there ought to be compelled to come, when others were willing to stay to transact the public business.

The motion to reconsider was disagreed to. [It was then 2 o'clock, A. M.]

After waiting for some time—

Mr. GIDEON LEE moved to dispense with the further proceedings of the call, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, he question was so taken and decided in the negative; yeas 23, nays 85.

On calling over the roll this time, notwithstanding that 123 one gentleman having been excused from indisposition members were recorded as being present, and the doors being locked—

Mr. CAMBRELENG said there were a number of gentlemen who had answered on the first call, but who had left before the doors were closed, and he therefore moved that the roll be again called to see who were the absentees, as those gentlemen had not been since sent for under the 51st rule.

[It was then a quarter to 3 o'clock.]

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana protested against being detained in that House as a prisoner; and also insisted that the motion of the gentleman from New York was out of order, since it would be making a second call pending the first, and one call could not be made to ride over another.

Mr. CAMBRELENG insisted that the call was indispensable for the reasons before stated; and made some further remarks on the propriety and necessity of the call.

Messrs. UNDERWOOD, WISE, VANDERPOEL, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and PARKS, made some remarks on the subject generally, which may be given hereafter.

Mr. WISE moved to dispense with the further proceedings in the call, which was disagreed to, as was also a motion to adjourn.

Pending the foregoing proceedings, (from half past three to quarter past four o'clock,) several gentlemen came in, and were excused on paying their fees.

Mr. HANNEGAN then renewed the motion indicated above by Mr. CAMBRELENG; but, after some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, HAYNES, and HANNEGAN, the motion was superseded by another of

Mr. PATTON, to suspend all further proceedings in the call, which, after a few remarks from Messrs. MCKAY, GRANGER, and ELMORE, was itself superseded by the motion of Mr. EVANS, who moved an adjournment, which was lost; and the question recurring upon Mr. PATTON'S motion, after several suggestions by Messrs. BRIGGS, LANE, and THOMAS.

Mr. TAYLOR demanded the previous question, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the fines be remitted: lost.

A number of suggestions and some desultory conversation ensued, which occupied another hour; and at length, at about half past five o'clock, the further proceedings were dispensed with, and the House again went into committee, and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON submitted an amendment proposing an increase of the salaries of the clerks in the different Departments, of from 12 to 20 per cent.

Mr. CONNOR submitted an amendment to the amendment, proposing an increase of clerks in the Post Office Department and Auditor's office. Lost, yeas 30, nays 96.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was also disagreed to.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved appropriations for salaries and outfits of Ministers to Prussia and Russia, and also for a plenipotentiary, when necessary, to Mexico.

Mr. EVANS moved another for surveying the North East boundary line, establishing monuments thereon, &c.

Both amendments were severally agreed to.

Mr. INGHAM submitted a proviso, that collectors of customs should receive certain fees in cases where their annual salaries did not exceed $1,000: lost.

Mr. JARVIS moved an item of $5,000 for four historical paintings for the panels in the rotundo of the Capitol; which was agreed to.

Several other amendments were introduced pro forma, to be removed in the House, by Messrs. PHILLIPS, JOHNSON of Virginia, PATTON, UNDERWOOD, and CONNOR, when, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose, and reported the "harbor bill," and the above bill, to the House, as amended.

It being now six o'clock in the morning,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that when the House adjourn this day, it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock.

Objection being made, Mr. J. moved a suspension of the rule: lost.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

The House then adjourned, having been in session about twenty hours.

[The proceedings throughout were marked with the usual courtesy of the body, and the best feelings generally prevailed among the members.]

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1837.

The CHAIR communicated a letter from the President elect, informing the Senate that he will be ready to take the oath on Saturday, the 4th of March instant, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. GRUNDY offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be appointed a committee of the Senate to make the necessary arrangements for the reception and inauguration of the President elect, on the 4th of March, and to apprise him of the same.

Mr. CLAY wished to learn from the Senator from Tennessee by what right, or rather, what had given rise to the practice of the Senate only, regulating the ceremonial in regard to the President elect, to the exclusion of any participation on the part of the House?

Mr. C. related the fact, that whilst he was the presiding officer of the House of Representatives, a difficulty occurred between himself and a committee of the Senate, in respect to the House, in which they desired to perform the ceremony of swearing in Mr. Monroe as President of the United States. The Senate had adopted a resolution similar to the present, and had applied for the use of the Hall, which Mr. C. granted, but the committee having insisted on bringing in their red morocco chairs, and thus, in appearance, doing away with the character of the body, he (Mr. C.) objected to their introduction, and the committee, in consequence retired somewhat huffed, and the ceremony took place in the open air. Mr. C. mentioned this circumstance, to show the unpleasantness which might arise from not having a proper understanding on the subject.

Mr. GRUNDY had not examined into the matter with a view of ascertaining whence the authority was derived to meet and perform the ceremony in the House. But he had examined the precedents, and found them to be in strict accordance with the order now made. He had found three cases to justify the course now proposed. If, however, the committee could not get the House, why they would have to go out of doors.

Mr. CLAY said that it was not his purpose to make any formal or serious objection to the resolution. To be sure, the fact of the House not being in session on the day when the inauguration was to take place was entitled to some weight. He was inclined to think it would be found that in the time of General Washington, and after that, the usage was not as at present.

The resolution was then considered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, the Chair was requested to appoint the committee, to consist of three.

The CHAIR then appointed the following gentlemen as the committee: Messrs. GRUNDY, TALLMADGE, and PARKER.

Mr. CLAY presented a number of petitions from citizens of Kentucky, principally slaveholders, setting forth their approbation of the Colonization Society, and the objects it has in view, declaring that it is regarded by a large majority of the people of Kentucky with great satisfaction; and the petitioners call upon Congress to extend their encouragement and aid to further the patriotic and laudable efforts of the society. The petitions were then laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY presented a memorial from certain hair-cloth manufacturers of the city of New York, protesting against any legislation by Congress, which shall interfere with the compromise act; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIVES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill making appropriations for the naval service, with amendments.

The bill for the relief of George Frazer and others was taken up as in Committee of the Whole, considered, read twice, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the officer charged with the survey of the Eastern Shore railroad.

The bill from the House, making appropriations for certain harbors, and for the removal of obstructions in various rivers, &c. was also taken up, as in Committee of the Whole, read a first and second time, and referred.

Mr. WALL, in pursuance of notice given, introduced a "bill concerning pilots," which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill making appropriations for the fortifications of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. W. then moved to strike out the second section, adopted as an amendment by the House, which provides for a distribution of the surplus, if there should be any, on the 1st of January, 1838.

A long debate ensued on this motion, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, CLAY, CRITTENDEN, PRESTON, and EWING of Ohio, spoke in favor of retaining the section, and Messrs. WRIGHT, BUCHANAN, RIVES, NILES, BROWN, BEN-TON, and WALL, against its adoption.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, the section was stricken out by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Black, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Crittenden, Clayton, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, Moore, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tomlinson, Webster, and White—19.

The Senate then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The bill for anticipating the indemnity accruing to citizens of the United States under the French treaty was taken up, and read a second time, and, on the question of its engrossment for a third reading,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1837.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Executive communications:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a list of the names of the Clerks employed in the Auditors Office of the Treasury, for the Post Office Department, for the year 1836; which was accidentally omitted in the statement prepared by the Register of the Treasury, in a former communication laid before the House; which, on motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

2. Also, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting abstracts of the official emoluments and expenditures for the year 1836, of the officers of the customs; which, on motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, was similarly disposed of.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio made an ineffectual effort to induce the House to take up sundry bills from the Senate on their first and second reading, and reference.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

The report and resolutions on the subject of our relations with Mexico, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, postponed until to-morrow.

The resolution of Mr. HARDY, proposing to print 5,000 copies of the Geological Survey of the United States, was also, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, postponed till to-morrow.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The joint resolution reported by Mr. GALBRAITH, from the select committee on the subject of the conduct of the Bank of the United States at Philadelphia reissuing the notes of the old institution, was, on motion of Mr. THOMAS, postponed until Thursday next.

A motion made by Mr. GALBRAITH at a subsequent stage of the proceedings, to print 5,000 extra copies of the report accompanying the above resolution, was entered, and ordered to lie over one day for consideration.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported Senate bill, without amendment, for the relief of Robertson Garrow, and another; which was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas McClellan and James Smith; read twice and committed.

TOBACCO.

On motion of Mr. JENIFER, the House took up and considered the following resolution, reported by Mr. J. some days since from the select committee, on the subject of the memorial of certain tobacco planters of Maryland and Virginia:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the President be requested to instruct the ministers and other representatives of this country in France, England, Russia, Prussia, Holland, and Germany, to negotiate with the respective Governments to which they are accredited, for a modification of the duties and restrictions upon tobacco imported from the United States; and that he also be requested to appoint special agents to negotiate in like manner with the Governments of those countries into which tobacco is imported under similar restrictions, that have no accredited representatives from the United States.

Mr. EVERETT thought this resolution had come too suddenly upon the House to be adopted without more consideration. He certainly did not feel himself then prepared to vote for it.

The resolution was concurred in, without a division.

Mr. SMITH moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the "bill directing the Secretary of War to report, annually, certain information relating to works of internal improvement." Mr. S. remarked, that he presumed there would be no objection.

Mr. CONNOR objected, and the motion was not pressed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Cornelius Manning; read twice and committed.

Mr. JARVIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported Senate bill for the relief of Charles D. Hunter, with a recommendation that it do not pass; committed.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Robb; read twice and committed.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DROMGOOLE, from the select committee to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to amending the Constitution of the United States, together with all propositions and resolutions submitted at the last and present session of Congress, proposing amendments to the Constitution, made a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to propose any of the aforesaid amendments to the Legislatures, or to conventions, of the several States.

Which, on Mr. D's motion, was ordered to lie on the table. On motion of Mr. JENIFER, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of John F. Wiley, Thomas McMarromy, John Steers, Eliam Higbee, David Hodge, Charles Larrabee, Brevet Major United States Army, Jacob M. Follansbee, Richard Gorvell, Neil Shannon, Abraham Stafford, David Hodge, Elijah Blodgett, James Corbin, William Hancock, Jonathan Been, John Morrell; and the same were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRANE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Samuel Bisby, heirs of James Craig, deceased, and the heirs of Colonel William Hasslet, deceased; which reports were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petition of John Kelly, for certain services rendered the United States; and the petition of Lewis Marchant; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions made unfavorable reports on the petitions of David Shoemaker, Benjamin Southard, McDowell Jackson, Ephraim Thabers, and John Taylor, severally praying pensions; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McKEON, from the select committee, to which was referred the resolution of the House of the 23d June, 1836, to contract with American artists for the execution of four paintings for the rotundo, made a report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. HENCHER objected.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rule.

Mr. HENCHER called for a division of the House.

The motion to suspend was agreed to—ayes 101, noes not counted.

HARBOR BILL.

The House then took up the bill to provide for certain harbors, and the removal of obstructions in and at the mouth of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for the year 1837.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were all severally concurred in, excepting the appropriation for the improvement of Cumberland river.

The amendment for the improvement of Cumberland river being taken up, was, after a few remarks by Messrs. CAMBRELENG and WILLIAMS of Kentucky, also agreed to.

Mr. PARKER then renewed his amendment for the improvement of New Brunswick harbor; which was disagreed to.

Mr. CRANE moved an amendment for the improvement of the Miami of Lake Erie, when

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House; ayes 72, noes 51; and the main question being ordered.

Mr. CARTER called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill, which were ordered, and were yeas 108, nays 41.

So the bill being ordered to be engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837.

The amendment providing outfits and salaries for Ministers to Russia and Austria, being taken up separately.

Mr. MERCER inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the President had recommended a mission to Austria—that to Prussia he (Mr. M.) had no objection to.

Mr. HOWARD (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs) said that he could answer the question probably better than the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and would do so. The proposition emanated from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was adopted by them, to aid, as far as they could, the views of a select committee of the House, who had made a report as to the best mode of increasing the consumption of tobacco in foreign countries, and particularly Germany. He believed that the gentleman from Virginia represented in part a tobacco interest, or at least he must feel anxious for its prosperity. After the Committee on Foreign Affairs had decided on the propriety of the measure, he (Mr. H.) had inquired at the Department of State if there existed any reasons why the plan should not be carried out; and was informed that, on the contrary, our Government was, at the present time, engaged in the discussion of a delicate question with both Austria and Prussia, arising out of treaties which we had with those Powers. What this question was, it is not now necessary to state. Mr. H.'s only object was to say, that although the proposed measure met with the concurrence of the Executive, he (Mr. H.) wished the responsibility of it to rest upon the committee on Foreign Affairs.

TEXAS.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina then moved to amend the amendment, by providing for the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent, to be sent to the independent Republic of Texas.

Mr. GREEN called for the yeas and nays on this amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. CUSHING said this question lay within the compass of a nutshell as a diplomatic question. He admitted and asserted the right of recognition, on our part, in all cases; but he insisted that the time of recognition was a question of discretion, to be exercised according to our own convictions of our own interest. In the present case, in Mr. C's judgment, that time had not arrived, and therefore he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS objected to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, for the further reason that the President had not recommended the recognition of the independence of Texas to Congress, and Mr. A. was not disposed to set the example of taking the responsibility from the hands of the Executive, where it properly belonged.

After some remarks by Messrs. JENIFER, MERCER, PICKENS, HANER, CHILTON ALLAN, and WILLIAM B. STEPHAN.

The last gentleman suggested the following modification: "Whenever the President of the United States may receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent power, and shall deem it expedient to appoint such minister."

Mr. THOMPSON accepted this as a modification.

After some remarks by Mr. WHITE of Kentucky,

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked, that the phraseology of the amendment involved an incongruity, as it was now modified, inasmuch as the first branch set forth that "Texas" was an "independent republic," and the second left the "evidence" of that fact to the "satisfaction" of the President; and limiting his sending the agent to that fact.

Mr. MERCER moved to strike out the words "the independent republic of."

The CHAIR ruled the motion to be out of order.

Mr. THOMPSON would compromise the difference between gentlemen, and modify the amendment by striking out the word "independent."

After some conversation between Messrs. HOAR, THOMPSON, and CAMBRELENG, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. THOMPSON as modified, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 76.

So the amendment to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was concurred in, and the whole appropriation was increased to meet the charge involved in the amendment.

The next amendment taken up, was an item appropriating, in the aggregate, the sum of $14,000, to defray the expenses of surveying the southwest boundary line of the United States.

Mr. HARDIN opposed it, on the ground that the treaty under which this boundary line was to be run, had become a dead letter, in consequence of the independence of Texas. It would be impracticable now to carry out its provisions on that account. He moved to strike out that part of the amendment in relation to running the line, until a treaty had been made with Texas.

Mr. HOWARD briefly replied, explaining the provisions of the treaty, and urging the necessity for the items proposed.

Mr. HARDIN'S motion was disagreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved a proviso to the clause, that the commissioners should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Agreed to.

The original amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The amendment moved in Committee of the Whole by Mr. STORER, for a medal to Morgan Neville, was agreed to; and the amendment moved therein by Mr. JARVIS, for filling the four panels in the rotundo of the Capitol with historical paintings, was concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Virginia, also renewed his amendment setting apart 400,000 acres of the unsold public lands to satisfy certain military boundary land warrants issued by the State of Virginia, and made an urgent appeal to the House to agree to it, and gave a condensed statement of the justice of the claims; when,

Mr. CHAPIN moved the previous question.

Mr. STORER inquired if the effect of the previous question would cut off all his amendments.

The CHAIR replied that it would cut off all amendments except those which had been engrossed on the bill by the House.

The demand for the previous question was seconded by the House, ayes 60, noes 65.

The question recurring upon ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. VINTON inquired of the Chair the effect of this motion being decided in the negative.

The CHAIR replied, that if the House refused to order the main question to be put, it would put the subject from before the House for this day.

Mr. STORER and Mr. HAVES severally asked for ten yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the question was carried without a division; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day.

ROAD BILLS.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PHILLIPS in the chair, and took up the "bill to provide for continuing the construction, and for the repair, of certain roads, and for other purposes, during the year 1837."

The bill having been read,

Mr. CORWIN proposed a substitute, which was agreed to.

Mr. CRARY submitted an additional section to the bill providing, that there be paid to the proper authorities of the State of Michigan the sum of 5 per cent. out of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in said State, from the first of November, 1835, to the first of July 1836, to be appropriated by the Legislature of said State for completing such roads as the Legislature may direct, and as may have been heretofore improved by the United States.

After some remarks from Messrs. CRARY and VINTON, the proposition was rejected.

Mr. CRANE proposed further to amend the bill, by committing the charge and superintendence of so much of the road as passes through Ohio to the Board of Works of that State.

After some remarks by Messrs. CRANE and LANE, the proposition was rejected.

Mr. KENNON moved to insert a clause authorizing the Secretary of War to cause a bridge to be built across the Ohio, at Wheeling, forming a junction with the Cumberland road on both sides of the river, appropriating $150,000 for that object.

Mr. HARDIN raised the point of order, that this amendment was substantially the same as a separate bill providing for the erection of a bridge at the same point, and therefore that the gentleman from Ohio could not move it.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order, on the ground that it was not identical, in all its provisions, with the bill referred to.

After some remarks from Messrs. KENNON, HARDIN, MERCER, and DENNY, the hour of three having arrived, the committee rose, and the House took a recess till half past 4 o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

The House, pursuant to order, resumed its session at half past 4 o'clock, P. M.

The "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government, for the year 1837," being on its third reading.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to strike out the proviso at the end of the bill empowering the collectors of customs, in certain cases, to appropriate the surplus fees among their Clerks.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD adverted to some alleged inconsistencies in the items for contingent expenditures in some of the departmental items.

Mr. HAYNES said there was a time when voting was more necessary than speaking, and believing that time had arrived, he must demand the previous question.

The House seconded the demand—yeas 82, nays 49, and a main question being ordered, was put, and carried without division.

So the bill was passed.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia, from the select investigating committee, appointed under the order of the 5th of January last, made a report on the subject, accompanied by the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money, have not all, or any of them by joint, or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2. Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that no agent for the transaction of business between the deposit banks and the Treasury Department, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement of said Department.

3. Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the business of the deposit banks with the Treasury Department, is not conducted through any agent, but is transacted directly with the Secretary of the Treasury, or some officer of the Department.

4. Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that no agent, in any way connected with the public deposits, since the removal of said deposits from the Bank of the United States, has received any compensation from the Treasury Department.

5. Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that several of the deposit banks have employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, for the purpose of receiving and transmitting information affecting the interests of said banks, both from the Treasury Department and other sources, and transmitting public documents. That agent is R. M. Whitney, who receives such salary from said banks, as they annually deem his services worth.

The resolutions having been read, were, on Mr. GARLAND'S motion, ordered, with the report, to be laid on the table, and be printed, together with the journal of the committee.

Mr. PEYTON, from the minority of the same committee, made a counter report, and moved that the same be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to said committee to report a "bill prohibiting in future, under sufficient penalties, the communication of secret intelligence, by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the benefit of the deposit banks or any other banks which concerns all the banks alike."

Mr. P. addressed the House at some length in support of the views taken by the minority, and the course recommended by them in the motion he had submitted. Before he had concluded, his remarks were arrested by Mr. BOON, on whose motion the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

Mr. WHITTLESEY asked leave to submit a resolution to suspend the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, if the Senate concur, which provides that no bill shall be sent from one House to the other on either of the last three days of the session, for this day—objection being made.

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved a suspension of the rule for this purpose.

Mr. LEWIS called for the yeas and nays, which were not ordered, and the motion to suspend was disagreed to—yeas 59, noes not counted.

Mr. PATTON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the Senate's bill designating and limiting the funds receivable for the revenue of the United States; which was agreed to—yeas 115, noes 25.

This bill had been reported back to the House with the following amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That no part of this act shall be construed as repealing any existing law relating to the collection of the revenue from customs or public lands in the legal currency, or as substituting bank notes of any description as a lawful currency for coin, as provided in the Constitution of the United States; nor to deprive the Secretary of the Treasury of the power to direct the collectors or receivers of the public revenue, whether derived from duties, taxes, debts, or sales of the public lands, not to receive in payment, for any sum due to the United States, the notes of any bank or banks which the said Secretary may have reason to believe unworthy of credit, or which he apprehends may be compelled to suspend specie payments."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, that at any other period of the session than the present, he might have addressed some remarks to the House on this subject, but he would now forbear. The Committee of Ways and Means, for the purpose of preventing a misconstruction of the act, and securing the public revenue from serious frauds, had brought forward this amendment. It was, however, for the House to adopt or reject it as they thought proper; but he hoped those gentlemen who were so solicitous about this bill, would grant him the privilege of recording his vote upon the amendment. Mr. C. then called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he would not occupy the attention of the House more than a moment. The amendment, he apprehended, was new to most of the members upon this floor. He had examined it carefully, and he believed that the effect of it, if it passed, would be to legalize powers that were claimed and exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury which were before, to say the least, very doubtful. Its effect would be to destroy the bill; to neutralize and to nullify every valuable provision in it. He stated this to the gentlemen of the west; for, if he understood the amendment, its effect, if carried out, would be the same as the Treasury order, viz: to bring the whole country, in the region of the land offices, down to a specie basis; to drive from circulation every bank note, which could be converted into specie, issued by the banks in the neighborhood of the land offices; and in place of their own paper, have in circulation the notes of distant banks—those of Pennsylvania, New York, and New England.

He did not give his assent to all the provisions of this bill; it was not one which he would have offered, nor was it the best bill that could have been presented and matured. He took this occasion to say, that he deemed the whole system of banking, the whole financial operations of the Government, so far as the currency was concerned, as in a distracted condition, and such as did not meet his concurrence. He believed it was a system which, sooner or later, would inflict, must inflict, on the country a calamity which now was probably little anticipated. He believed that the currency of this wide extended country never could be properly regulated without some great central controlling power over the State banks. But he would not now go further into the subject, because he knew that the time of the House was too valuable, at this period of the session, to be occupied by him.

Mr. MANN of New York said gentlemen looked upon this bill as a repeal of the Treasury order. This was not so; because at last it left the matter with the Secretary of the Treasury; and he ventured to say, if the bill was now passed, the specie order would not be repealed. It did not require the Secretary of the Treasury to receive the notes of specie paying banks for the public revenue, but left it discretionary with him to do so or not. The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means merely declared the effect of the provisions of the Constitution, which were paramount to all the laws which could be passed on the subject. If the bill went to legalize the notes of any banks in payment for the public revenue, he ventured to assert that it would receive but few votes in that House.

Mr. MERCER made some remarks in opposition to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann,) and in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BOULDIN briefly addressed the House in support of the bill, as a remedy for, or a choice of, evils.

Mr. PATTON supported the bill, and opposed the amendment, which he insisted went to nullify the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND remarking, that the House and the nation well understood the whole subject, demanded the previous question.

Mr. GALBRAITH inquired if the previous question would cut off the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The CHAIR replied that such would be the effect of the success of that motion.

The House decided the demand for the previous question—yeas 82, noes 66.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then said as this previous question was one of the most important ever taken in that House, he must ask for the yeas and nays on the question "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered.

Mr. ELMORE said as he had voted under a misapprehension for the second to the previous question, he would move a reconsideration of that vote.

The CHAIR. The motion was a novel one, but he had no doubt of its not being in order.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 126, nays 71, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was then read a third time and passed, (after some remarks from Mr. HARDIN, explanatory of the reasons of his voting against the bill.)

The joint resolution from the Senate, proposing a suspension of the 16th joint rule of the two Houses, prescribing that "no bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session," was then taken up.

Mr. CAMBRELENG should oppose the resolution, unless it designated the bills intended to be acted upon, and he moved to postpone it till to-morrow; but, after some conversation with Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, he substituted a motion that it lie over till the evening recess; which, after a few words from Messrs. ADAMS, CAVE JOHNSON, MERCER, and SUTHERLAND, was agreed to.

LAND BILL.

The Senate bill to prohibit the sales of the public lands except to actual settlers, and in limited quantities, being read a first time.

Mr. HARDIN objected to the bill, and went on to give the reasons why he objected at some length. Mr. H. withdrew the motion made by him on a former day to reject the bill.

Mr. BOON then obtained the floor, but the hour of 3 having arrived, he gave way, without proceeding, for the House to take its usual recess till half past 4 o'clock.

ERRATUM.—In the report of the remarks made by Mr. LYON in support of his proposition to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Mobile bay, at Dog river bar and Chalklaw pass, from twenty to fifty thousand dollars, a mistake was committed in printing the word work instead of work. "Mr. LYON said he feared the small sum of twenty thousand dollars proposed in the bill would not be sufficient to make all the necessary preparation for the commencement of the work, and have on hand a sum sufficient to enable much progress to be made in deepening the channel across the bar," &c. It is not contemplated to construct a wall of any description.

[EVENING SESSION.]

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "an act to prohibit the sales of public lands, except to actual settlers, in limited quantities, and for other purposes."

Mr. BOON was entitled to the floor, but after some conversation gave way to

Mr. UNDERWOOD, who renewed the motion, made by his colleague (Mr. HARRIS), and withdrawn, to reject the bill.

Mr. H. then made an argument of considerable length against the provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. LOVE moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GARDNER moved a call of the House. Lost.

Mr. GARLAND called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, which were ordered.

Mr. McKENNA moved a call of the House, and, on that motion, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 61, nays 124.

So the House refused to order the call.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 107, nays 91—as follows:

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Heman Allen, Bailey, Beale, Bond, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Cathoon, William B. Shepperd, Slade, Smith, Spangler, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Tallaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, Elisha Whiteley, Lewis Williams, and Wise—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, J. E. H. Claiborne, Coles, Cramer, Cray, Cushman, Doubleday, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Gholson, Rice Garland, Haber, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Albert G. The following resolutions, which were offered yesterday, were considered and adopted.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate have printed such of the reports and drafts referred to in the communication of the Secretary of War of the 23d January last, as the Secretary of the Senate, on consultation with the Chief of the Topographical Bureau, may deem proper to be printed, together with such other reports on the same subject, as may be on the files of the two Houses, to be selected as aforesaid.

Being satisfied that this would be the case, and as time was now so precious, he felt it his duty to move to lay the motion of reconsideration on the table. Mr. W. withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. CALHOUN, who said he concurred with the Senator from Mississippi in what he had said as to the rule. FORTIFICATION BILL.

returned from the Senate with an amendment striking out the second section, viz: that providing for the distribution of the surplus revenue, (as before given at length.)

Mr. BELL moved that the House "adhere."

The CHAIR remarked that the section stricken out by the Senate was a part of the original bill of the House; and the parliamentary motions would be either to "concur" or "disagree." The rejection of the latter motion, if made, by the House, would be an affirming of the former.

Mr. BELL then varied his motion to disagree with the Senate in their amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the question would be decided without debate.

Mr. MERCER addressed the House for some time on the subject of the deposit banks, but the line of argument taken by him was inaudible.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, believing that every gentleman had made up his mind on this subject, he demanded the previous question.

Mr. CHILDS moved a call of the House, and

Mr. GRAVES asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 71, nays 113.

So the House refused the call, and the question recurring on the demand for the previous question, it was seconded by the House without a division.

Mr. HOWELL asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put, but they were refused, and the main question was ordered without a division.

The main question being, that the House do disagree with the Senate's amendment was then propounded, and

Mr. BELL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were yeas 111, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton, Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Carey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel M. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darling, Dawson, Delberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hildall, Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Heister, Herod, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Kenyon, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Lay, Luke, Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKenney, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Parker, James A. Shepherd, Siade, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Back, Beckee, Boyce, Boyd, Burnside, Burns, Bynum, Cambreng, Chaney, Chapin, John F. H. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turill, Vanderpoel, Wagner, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Wise, and Yell—94.

So the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to by the House.

Mr. CHAPIN said when the name of his colleague, Mr. Moore was called some one answered for him, and he inquired of the Chair whether his colleague's name was recorded.

The SPEAKER said it was recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. CHAPIN said it was clearly a mistake, for his colleague was sick, and had not been in the House to-day.

His name was erased by the unanimous consent of the House.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire in the chair; and on motion of the same gentleman, took the amendments of the Senate to the "Indian annuity bill," which, having been concurred in—

Mr. CAMBRELENG submitted several additional items, which he said had undergone the revision both of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The principal of these were as follows:

For carrying into effect the treaty with the Menominees, of September, 1836, $288,540.

For carrying into effect the treaty with the Pottawatomies, of August, 1836, $73,423.

For the same with the Ioways, of September, 1836, $65,580.

For the same with the Sacs and Foxes of September, 1836, $138,240.

For the same with the Missourias, $3,000.

For the same with the Omahas, $2,470.

Several other additional items were also proposed, together with a proposition for an inquiry into the depredations committed by the hostile Indians of the south; (the latter slightly modified on motion of Mr. E. WHITTLESEY,) all of which were agreed to.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted several additional items and amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia submitted an amendment, proposing an appropriation of $17,000 to defray the expenses of holding treaties with all the Indian tribes east of the Mississippi, and of examining the country to be assigned to them, &c. which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

NAVAL SERVICE.

The Committee then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, took up the amendments of the Senate to the "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837."

All the amendments of the Senate, with one exception, were concurred in.

The amendment appropriating the sum of $100,000 for launching the ship of the line Pennsylvania, was taken up.

Mr. FRENCH moved to amend it by inserting a provision authorizing the President to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen and boatmen on the vestern waters, suitable sites for marine hospitals, &c. not exceeding three upon the Ohio, three upon the Mississippi, and one upon Lake Erie; which after some remarks from Messrs. FRENCH, PHILLIPS, DUNLAP, DENNY, and JARVIS, was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana proposed an item of $70,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at New Orleans; which, after some remarks from Messrs. JOHNSON, HUNT, SMITH, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina, was rejected.

Mr. HARPER of Pennsylvania then adduced a letter from an officer of the navy, in support of the propriety of ordering the Pennsylvania to be launched forthwith; and said a few words himself in support of the amendment to the Senate, and after some further remarks from Messrs. INGERSOLL, REED, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to insert $400,000 in place of $100,000.

Mr. CAMBRELENG resisted this increase, and said the appropriations in this bill were already large enough for the present year—larger, by far, than met his approbation.

The amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL was then disagreed to, only 45 voting for it, and the question recurring on the agreeing to the amendment of the Senate as amended by the committee.

Mr. MERCER moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. FRENCH's amendment had been adopted, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island moved further to amend the Senate's amendment by appropriating the sum of $15,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, Maine, $10,000 for one at Wilmington, North Carolina, and alike for a similar object at Newport, Rhode Island; which, after some remarks from Messrs. PEARCE, JARVIS and SUTHERLAND, the amendment of Mr. PEARCE was disagreed to, and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was agreed to—yeas 77, nays 57.

Mr. LYON moved an amendment making an appropriation of $15,000 for a marine hospital at Mobile; lost.

The committee then rose and reported, and the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the Indian annuity bill having been agreed to by the House, the amendments of the Senate, as amended, were severally concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment of the Committee of the Whole (Mr. French's above) to the amendment of the Senate to the naval service bill, but before any action was had thereon the hour of three having arrived, it took the usual recess till half past four.

EVENING SESSION.

The "bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1837," returned from the Senate with amendments, being under consideration; the question pending was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in the following:

The Senate had amended the bill by inserting a clause appropriating "$100,000 for launching and securing the ship of the line Pennsylvania;" and the Committee of the Whole had amended the same by inserting an additional item, authorizing the President to select and cause to be purchased, for the use and benefit of sick seamen and boatmen on the western waters, suitable sites for marine hospitals, &c. not exceeding three upon the Ohio, three upon the Mississippi, and one upon Lake Erie.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for a division of the question on the amendment, so as to take it separately on that of the Senate and that of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIR ruled that such a division was out of order, but suggested to the gentleman from Tennessee that he might attain his object by a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and, if that motion should prevail, there moving a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment to the amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON accordingly made that motion.

Mr. WARDWELL moved the previous question, but the House refused to second it; and the motion to recommit was disagreed to without a division.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana moved an amendment making appropriations for marine hospitals at New Orleans, Mobile, Portland, Newport, and Wilmington, North Carolina, amounting in all to $15,000.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON of Louisiana, SMITH, REYNOLDS of Illinois, PEARCE of Rhode Island, and PARKER, the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was agreed to—yeas 79, nays 55.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole as amended.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BOND opposed the amendment on the ground that it had been introduced with the expectation of carrying it through by a bargain. He was opposed to all bargains of this kind, and would take the responsibility of voting against this amendment.

Mr. LANE would say to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Bond) that he made no bargains, that he did not belong to the bargain and sale party, that he was not surprised to hear that gentleman denounce the amendment in such unmeasured terms; it was an appropriation for the west, and connected with western interests so uniformly opposed by that gentleman.

After some remarks by Mr. SUTHERLAND in support of the amendment,

Mr. JARVIS moved an amendment providing that no greater sums should be expended on said hospitals than the amounts herein appropriated; agreed to.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, and decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 110.

So the House non-concurred in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate, making an appropriation of $100,000 for launching and repairing the ship of the line Pennsylvania.

Mr. JARVIS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES and SUTHERLAND, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 86.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

All the other amendments of the Senate were then concurred in without a division.

Mr. WISE moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of allowing him, at this time, to make a report from a select committee; lost.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole. Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire in the Chair, and took up the "bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837," which had been returned from the Senate with various amendments.

The first amendment of the Senate was, that the annual salary of the Recorder of the General Land Office shall be $2,000, and that the sum of $100 shall be paid to Charles Gordon for services rendered under the resolution of the Senate of July 2, 1836.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an amendment to this amendment, making the salaries of the three assistant postmasters general the same as the Auditors of the Treasury, and Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BOND addressed the House at some length in opposition to the amendment.

After some few remarks by Mr. CAMBRELENG, Mr. BRIGGS withdrew his amendment.

The amendment of the Senate to increase the salary of the Surveyor General of Arkansas from $1,500 to $2,000 being taken up separately, was discussed by Messrs. YELL, LOVE, CAVE JOHNSON, and JOHNSON of La. after which the committee non-concurred in the amendment.

The amendment of the Senate making an appropriation of $30,000 for the purchase of certain manuscripts of the late James Madison, being taken up separately, was, after some remarks by Messrs. DAWSON, HUNTSMAN, and CAMBRELENG, concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate to increase the fund for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, being taken up separately, was, after some explanations between Messrs. CAMBRELENG, A. H. SHEPHERD, HOWARD, CAVE JOHNSON, non-concurred in.

Mr. CUSHING moved an amendment appropriating $15,000 for the purchase of Gales and Seaton's Debates, for the use of members; which was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Tennessee, moved an amendment, also increasing the salaries of the messengers and assistant messengers; which was agreed to.

Mr. G. LEE moved an amendment increasing the salaries of the collectors, namely: officers and surveyors, &c. twenty-five per cent.; lost.

After some remarks by Messrs. JOHNSON, THOMPSON of South Carolina, R. GARLAND, and LAWRENCE,

Mr. VINTON moved an amendment providing that said increase shall not be allowed to any clerk who now receives more than $1,200.

After some remarks by Messrs. VINTON, ANTHONY CAMBRELENG, and HAWES, the amendment of Mr. VINTON was disagreed to—yeas 21, nays 103.

Mr. PEYTON moved an amendment excepting the clerks in the Quartermaster General's Office; lost.

Mr. GRENELL moved an amendment, including the first clerks to commandants in the navy yards at New York, Boston, and Norfolk.

After some remarks by Mr. GRENELL, the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved an amendment, to increase the pay of the officers of the army twenty-five per cent.; lost.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved an amendment appropriating $8,200 as compensation for commissioner, secretary, and contingent expenses of the commissioners under the convention with Spain; agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senate, increasing the salaries of clerks, was concurred in; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. PEYTON then moved the following amendment:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an officer to be called the Superintendent of the Public Deposites, whose duty it shall be to manage and superintend all the correspondence, business, and interest connected with the deposite banks under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and whose correspondence and all other proceedings shall be deemed official, and regularly filed and kept, with other papers of the Treasury Department.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said superintendent shall receive an annual compensation of $3,500.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be continued or hereafter selected as a depository of the public money, unless such bank shall expressly stipulate that all correspondence or proceedings between said banks and the Secretary of the Treasury, or between said banks and the said superintendent, and any other person or persons, touching said deposite and disbursements, shall be open at all times to the inspection or examination of either House of Congress.

Mr. PEYTON addressed the House at great length in support of his amendment, and in the course of his remarks he called upon Mr. ADAMS to make a statement in relation to a report of the minority of the Bank Investigating Committee in 1832.

Mr. THOMAS made some remarks in reply to Mr. PEYTON.

Mr. ADAMS rose, and was proceeding with his remarks, when

Mr. ANTHONY raised a point of order, that it was not in order to go into an examination of the Investigating Committee report in 1832.

Mr. CHAMBERS of Kentucky moved that Mr. ADAMS have leave to proceed in his remarks; and the question being taken by tellers, there was no quorum found voting.

Mr. GHOLSON moved that the committee rise and report the fact to the House, which was agreed to.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, the chairman reported the fact that the Committee of the Whole had found itself without a quorum.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 36, nays 95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

There being a quorum in attendance, the Chairman resumed the chair.

The question pending when the committee rose, was on granting leave to Mr. ADAMS to proceed, which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS then proceeded and concluded his statement, and was applied to by Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. PEYTON then concluded his remarks; when

Mr. HAMER obtained the floor, and addressed the committee at some length in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WISE next addressed the committee at some length in reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN made some remarks in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise.)

Mr. FAIRFIELD made a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton.)

Mr. MARTIN then made some few remarks in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment of Mr. PEYTON was then disagreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved an amendment, raising the salaries of the clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives; agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose and reported to the House.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, and the chairman reported,

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD,
The House adjourned at 5 o'clock, A. M.

IN SENATE, FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1837.

The CHAIR laid before the Senate some communications from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the 28th inst. transmitting a number of documents relative to the Topographical Bureau; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The standing committees of the Senate were discharged from the further consideration of all subjects which had been referred to them.

Mr. HENDRICKS offered a resolution (which was considered and agreed to) to allow Mr. Haigh, the assistant door keeper, $300 extra for his services as postmaster of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER offered a resolution (which was adopted) that the Senate should proceed to the election of a printer at two o'clock.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, on leave, introduced a bill for the relief of William Park; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

The following bills were read the third time and passed:

The act giving the assent of Congress to the act of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled an act to amend the act to incorporate the Falmouth and Alexandria rail road company.

The bill granting an increase of pension to W. C. Hamilton.

The bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place the name of J. C. Swift on the navy pension list.

The bill for the relief of Philip F. Boree.

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claims of the United States on the Alleghany Bank was returned from the House with an amendment; which was concurred in by the Senate.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and, after some time was spent therein, the doors were re-opened.

The following resolution was offered by Mr. PRESTON:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, as soon as he shall have acted finally on the proceedings of the Military Court of Inquiry, lately held at Frederick, in Maryland, to transmit a copy thereof to the Senate, or to the Secretary of the Senate, if the Senate be not in session, and that the Secretary cause the same to be printed, without delay, and transmitted to the Senators respectively.

Mr. BENTON remarked that he had some doubt as to whether the President possessed the power to have published the proceedings of a Court of Inquiry; and he thought there were cases in which a Chief Magistrate had refused to do it. In cases of Courts Martial, he believed the President had exercised the power. Mr. B. thought the whole of the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry should be published in an authentic form. He, however, had no objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The resolution was then considered and adopted.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, was returned from the House with sundry amendments; after a few words from Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. WRIGHT, relative to the amendment allowing an additional compensation to clerks in some of the Departments—the first contending against it, and the latter for it—this and all the other amendments were concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT said that the House had insisted upon their non-concurrence in the amendment, made by the Senate to the bill making appropriations for fortifications, and they had returned the papers to this body. He, therefore, moved that the Senate ask a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint a committee.

The CHAIR accordingly appointed the following gentlemen: Messrs. WRIGHT, WEBSTER, and PARKER.

Mr. WRIGHT offered the following resolution; which was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate of the 5th day of January, 1830, be, and the same is hereby rescinded, and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is authorized to appoint three clerks, in addition to those now authorized by law, to be employed in his office, whose respective salaries shall not exceed $1,500 each per annum, to continue until the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Mr. WEBSTER offered the following order, which was adopted:

Ordered, That when the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States shall be prepared and completed at the Treasury, the Secretary of the Senate shall cause the usual number to be printed, and sent by mail to the members of the Senate, unless some joint resolution respecting the printing thereof be passed at the present session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. WALKER the Senate in pursuance of the resolution adopted this morning proceeded to the election of a printer and the first ballot resulted as follows: Fifty votes were given of which twenty-six were necessary to a choice; of these

Blair and Rives had	28
Gales and Seaton	19
Thomas Allen	2
Blank	1
	50

So that Blair and Rives were declared to be duly elected.
The Senate then at 3 o'clock took a recess until half past four.

EVENING SESSION.

The CHAIR communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of the annual statement of commerce and navigation of the United States for the year ending December 31, 1836; stating that it could not be completed in time to be sent in before the adjournment of Congress, but that it would be ready within a few days thereafter, and suggesting the propriety of having it printed under the direction of the Secretary, and transmitted by him to the members.

The resolution submitted by Mr. WEBSTER on this subject, and given above, was then adopted.

Mr. WALL moved to take up the resolution submitted by him some days ago, and laid on the table, authorizing the purchase of certain books for the several committee rooms of the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were accordingly ordered, and the motion was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Ewing of Illinois, Ewing of Ohio, Kent, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Moore, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Sevier, Southard, Spence, and Wall—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hendricks, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Page, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Walker, and White—24.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business; and when the doors were opened.

The bill incorporating the Fire Insurance Company of Georgetown was returned from the House with various amendments, in which the Senate concurred.

The bill for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund, returned from the House with an amendment, was, on motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, referred to the Committee on Commerce for their examination. It was afterwards reported from the committee, with their recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, and the Senate did accordingly disagree.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the amendment of the House to the bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1837, reported that the committee had examined the same, and recommended the concurrence of the Senate in them, and the Senate accordingly concurred.

On motion of Mr. LINN, the forty-seventh rule of the Senate was so far rescinded as to allow Senators to introduce ladies on the floor without the bar of the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT rose and said that the House of Representatives had determined in adhering to their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the fortification bill. He would not at this late hour take up the time of the session with any unnecessary remarks, as every thing connected with the subject was perfectly understood by every member of the body. He would content himself with simply moving that the Senate in their part adhere to their disagreement; and on this question he asked for the yeas and nays.

After a debate, in which Messrs. CALHOUN, WEBSTER, BENTON, WALKER, EWING of Ohio, DAVIS, WRIGHT, CLAY, and CUTHBERT, participated;

The question was then taken, and the Senate determined to adhere to its disagreement, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Ewing of Illinois, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, King of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Webster, and White—23.

A message was received from the House, that they insist on their amendment, to which the Senate had disagreed, to the bill for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund; which was, on motion of Mr. RIVES, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, who recommended that the Senate recede from their disagreement; and the Senate receded accordingly.

Mr. PRESTON offered a resolution; which was agreed to, to give John Jamieson $200 out of the contingent fund, on account of an injury received by him, whilst in the discharge of his public duties.

Mr. HUBBARD submitted a joint resolution, providing for the appointment of a committee, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses having finished the business before them, were ready to adjourn the present session of Congress. This resolution was agreed to, and sent to the House for concurrence.

Mr. KING of Alabama, the President pro tem, having temporarily left the Chair,

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be tendered to the honorable WILLIAM R. KING, President pro tempore, for his late impartial and dignified services as presiding officer.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to take up the memorial presented by him some days since from the Cherokee Indians, for the purpose of printing the memorial.

Mr. KING of Georgia objected to the printing, on the ground of there being no object in printing; but to keep up an unnecessary excitement.

Mr. SOUTHARD warmly advocated the motion, and asked for the yeas and nays.

After some remarks from Messrs. KING of Georgia, BUCHANAN, WALKER, and WEBSTER, the question was taken, and the Senate refused to take up the memorial.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, leave was granted to the memorialists to withdraw their memorial.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were now ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and were answered by the President that he had no other official communication to make, but that he had charged him to say that it was the wish of his heart that each member of Congress might enjoy health and prosperity in this world, and happiness in the next.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER,
The Senate then adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, March 2, 1837.

Mr. WHITTLESSEY of Ohio, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Hugh McDonald: read twice and committed.

Mr. W. also made a great number of unfavorable reports.

Mr. DARLINGTON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Charles Bell: read twice and committed.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS PRIOR TO 1800.

Mr. HOWARD said that he was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which were referred numerous memorials from claimants for French spoiliations prior to 1800, to move that a list of those claimants, which he held in his hand, be printed for the use of the House. It had been asserted by those opposed to the claims, that they were chiefly in the hands of speculators, who had purchased them at a small price, and were therefore not entitled to as much justice as the original sufferers would have been. The committee had endeavored to classify the petitioners, and the result would show that there was little or no foundation for this opinion. When the names should be printed, he hoped the members of the House would test its accuracy by examining the names of the claimants in the several States.

Mr. H. said he would add upon his individual responsibility, as a member of this House, that, from a laborious investigation, he was satisfied of the intrinsic justice of these claims, and believed that they must, and would, be paid at some time or other. As far as his voice could reach, he encouraged the claimants to persevere, and not suffer their energy to be overcome by the long delay which had been heretofore painfully, and, he would add, unjustly experienced.

The following is an abstract of the list:
ABSTRACT of petitioners on account of French Spoiliations prior to 1800, and whose memorials are now before Congress, viz:

From the State of Maine,	69
“ New Hampshire,	59
“ Vermont,	2
“ Massachusetts,	262
“ Rhode Island,	25
“ Connecticut,	60
“ New York,	101
“ New Jersey,	4
“ Pennsylvania,	106
“ Delaware,	5
“ Maryland,	124
“ District of Columbia,	20
“ Virginia,	49
“ North Carolina,	25
“ South Carolina,	27
“ Georgia,	3
“ Kentucky,	3
“ Ohio,	6
“ Alabama,	2
“ Mississippi,	1
“ Louisiana,	2
“ Missouri,	1
“ Indiana,	1
Total,	956

And the following appears to be a proper classification of the above stated petitioners, viz:

Petitioners of original claimants in their own right,	445
“ of administrators,	107
“ of executors,	113
“ for heirs,	37
“ for estates,	45
“ as surviving partners,	79
“ as guardians,	2
“ widows for estates,	4
“ as assignees of bankrupts and as trustees of insolvents,	52
“ of insurance companies, as assignees of original claimants, for losses covered by insurance,	18
“ of original claimants, “for self, and others,”	13
“ do do “by attorney,”	23
“ do do “by agent,”	15
Total,	956

The motion of Mr. H. was agreed to without a division.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report of the testimony taken by that committee in the case of Judge Thruston, and moved that it be laid on the table and printed; which was ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE asked leave to offer a resolution allowing members to lay such petitions as were in their possession, and they desired to present, on the table, and entered on the journal; but it was objected to.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled “An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claim of the United States on the Alleghany Bank of Pennsylvania;” and the same having been brought into the House,

Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed a substitute, which was agreed to, and the bill having been engrossed was read a third time and passed.

[The title of the substitute was as follows: “An act authorizing the proper officer of the Treasury Department to credit the account of the Treasurer of the United States, with the amount of unavailable funds, &c.”]

Mr. HUNTSMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Martin Kingsbury: read twice and committed.

Mr. WISE, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the various Executive Departments, presented the reports of the majority and minority of that committee, and also the views of an individual member of the committee, which he moved to lay on the table, and that the reports, journal of the committee, and accompanying documents, be printed; which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, 5000 extra copies of the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the select committee on the subject of banks, made a final report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, submitted a resolution to pay the little boys an extra compensation [of $250 for the season] in addition to their pay of $1 50 a day; which, after being amended so as to include messengers, and others, on motions of Messrs. WARDWELL, GRENNELL, and BELL, and after some remarks from Messrs. MCLENE, CONNOR, HARPER, RENCHER, and A. H. SHEPHERD,

Mr. RENCHER moved that the Clerk be directed to pay them $100 extra; and, after some remarks from Mr. McKEN-

NAN, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the previous question; but subsequently withdrew it, and the subject being further discussed,

Mr. HOWELL moved to lay the resolution as modified and amended on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion, but the House refused to order them, and also refused to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. McKENNA then demanded the previous question, which was seconded; yeas 55, nays 42, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolutions; but they were refused, and the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to proceed to the orders of the day, being the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. MERCER moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of submitting a resolution reported from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to rescind the 16th joint resolution of the two Houses, so as to send to the Senate the bill to provide for the selection and purchase of sites for marine hospitals on the western waters, but the motion was rejected without a count.

The House then passed to the ORDERS OF THE DAY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House took up the “bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837,” which had been reported from the Committee of the Whole with sundry amendments, at half past 5 o'clock this morning.

The amendment making an appropriation of $16,000 for Gales and Seaton's Debates, for the use of members, was taken up separately.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. RENCHER then moved to amend the amendment by providing that these books be deposited in the library, which was disagreed to, and the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The amendment increasing the salaries of the clerks of the two Houses of Congress, was taken up separately, and, after some remarks by Mr. RENCHER, was concurred in.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole proposing to reduce the salary of the Surveyor General of Arkansas from $2000 to $1500, was disagreed to—yeas 63, nays 84.

The amendment of the Senate, increasing the item for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse from $12,000 to $30,000, was disagreed to by the Committee of the Whole, and after some remarks by Messrs. HOWARD, JENIFER, and A. H. SHEPHERD, the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was disagreed to.

The other various amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in, and the question recurring on the concurrence in the Senate's amendment,

The amendment increasing the salaries of the Clerk's in the various Executive Departments being taken up separately,

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on the question of concurrence in this amendment of the Senate, which were ordered.

After some remarks by Messrs. HAMER, THOMPSON, C. JOHNSON, RENCHER, CONNOR, HARDIN, MANN of N. York, HOWELL, and WISE.

Mr. TURRILL moved the previous question, which was seconded by the House, and the main question was ordered.

A division was called for, and the question was first taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, increasing the salaries of the clerks in the Executive Departments, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 160, nays 83.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

All the other amendments of the Senate were then concurred in by the House.

FORTIFICATION BILL—DISTRIBUTION OF THE REVENUE.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, took up the “bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837.”

This bill had been passed by the House with an additional section providing for the distribution of the surplus revenue, (as before given,) the Senate had struck out this section, and returned it to the House. The House then disagreed to the amendment of the Senate striking out the clause, returned the bill to the Senate with their disagreement, and the Senate had again sent it back “insisting” on their amendment.

Mr. BELL moved that this House do insist upon their disagreement.

Mr. HAYNES said he regretted exceedingly that the late period of the session placed it out of his power, with due regard to the proper legislation of the House, to express the views he entertained on this momentous subject. But, under the circumstances which surrounded him, he would confine himself to a reply to the brief observations of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Bell.) That gentleman had adverted to the fact that questions of revenue fall peculiarly within the province of this House. But what is the question we are now called upon to decide? It does not relate either to the creation or ordinary expenditure of the revenue. It is, whether this House shall insist upon retaining their proposition to distribute to, or deposit with, the States, a large portion of the public revenue.

Upon such a question the Senate was peculiarly qualified to decide, as they represent the very States with which the proposition of the House provides to deposit the public money. If there is any body on the face of the earth peculiarly qualified to decide such a question, it is the Senate. And if that body ever made a decision especially entitled to respect, it is the decision now in question.

Mr. HUNTSMAN then demanded the previous question, which was seconded by the House—ayes 122, noes not counted, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. McKIM asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered.

Mr. RENCHIER moved a call of the House and asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the motion for a call of the House was rejected.

The main question being "that this House do insist on its disagreement with the amendment of the Senate," was then propounded, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allen, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlingston, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Fowler, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Grayson, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazeltine, Heister, Herod, Hoar, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James, Henry Johnson, Kennon, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Parker, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Russell, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Stancie, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whiteley, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Boyce, Boyd, Burns, Cambreling, Chapman, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Haley, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Klingsmith, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKee, McKim, McLene, Miller, Mullenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpool, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whiteley, and Yell—88.

So the House insisted on its disagreement.

HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Mr. SMITH in the Chair, and on motion of the former gentleman took up the amendments of the Senate to the harbor bill.

The amendment of the Senate in relation to the Delaware breakwater being taken up.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana renewed the amendment offered by him on yesterday to another bill, proposing to appropriate $70,000 for the erection of a marine hospital in the city of New Orleans, and

Mr. FRENCH renewed his amendment to the amendment, appropriating $15,000 for the selection and purchase of suitable sites for marine hospitals on the western waters, not exceeding three on the Mississippi, three on the Ohio, and one on Lake Erie, for the use and benefit of such seamen and boatmen; which was agreed to—ayes 80, noes 45.

Mr. LYON moved further to amend the proposed amendment by appropriating ten thousand dollars for a marine hospital in the city of Mobile.

Mr. L. insisted that the same reasons which had been urged by the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. Johnson,) in support of his amendment, applied with equal force to Mobile. That city was known to be increasing in population, wealth and business with great rapidity. It was situated in a climate regarded as somewhat unhealthy at certain seasons, but its immense trade required the employment of seamen and boatmen at all seasons of the year, and if hospitals were to be provided for sick seamen and boatmen at the expense of the Government at any points, he regarded the southern cities as the places most entitled to notice. The amount he had proposed was small, and he hoped his amendment would not be rejected. The amendment prevailed without a division.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved a general appropriation of $150,000, to cover a suspension of the twenty per cent. hospital money for one year; which, after some remarks from Messrs. PHILLIPS, CRAIG, PINCKNEY, and PARKER, was agreed to—ayes 75, noes 52.

Mr. MCKAY moved a further amendment, appropriating $15,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Portland, Maine, $1,000 for one at Wilmington, North Carolina, and a like sum for one at Newport, Rhode Island; lost.

Mr. LOVE proposed a sum of $50,000 for the purchase of a site, and the erection of a marine hospital at Buffalo, New York. Lost without a division.

Mr. JARVIS then moved a proviso that the expenditures for the purchase of sites and the erection of marine hospitals at New Orleans and Mobile, should not exceed the sums appropriated; which was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, as amended, was then concurred in.

Mr. DUNLAP moved a proviso, that one of the hospitals to be erected on the Mississippi should be at Memphis, Tennessee, and that $20,000 be appropriated for that purpose. Lost.

The question recurring on the amendment of the Senate, as amended, after some remarks from Messrs. CHILDS, HUNTSMAN, JOHNSON of Louisiana, and CRAIG, it was concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky moved a verbal amendment to the clause appropriating $5,000 for continuing the improvement of Cumberland river in Kentucky and Tennessee; which was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Senate considered was the one appropriating the sum of $300,000 for the benefit of the citizens of Alexandria, D. C. to aid them in completing their public works, and for debts already incurred thereon.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved an amendment, providing for the protection of the harbor of Georgetown, by prohibiting obstructions being thrown therein.

Mr. BOULGIN said he knew there were but few hours left to transact business this session. He knew that we are the guardians of the people of this District. He knew that of all the hours devoted to others during the session, or thrown away, not one had fallen to the lot of the District. As a member of the committee, he felt that the people of Alexandria had a right to expect him to do and to say what he could for them. But what could he do, or what time did he have to say any thing, in their behalf? None. He would only say that he had examined into the matter. He knew nothing of such work of his own knowledge; but he had inquired into their grievances, and reviewed the legislation of Congress in relation to Alexandria. He would be held responsible for the correctness of the opinion, that Alexandria had suffered not only neglect in the little attention the District had ever got from Congress when compared with the balance of the District, but actual injustice.

After some remarks from Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON, W. B. SHEPARD, VINTON, and MERCER, the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, so amended, was then concurred in—ayes 81, noes 49.

Mr. HANNegan moved an amendment declaring Logansport, in the State of Indiana, a port of entry, and appropriating a sum of $50,000 for the removal of obstructions in the navigation of the Great Wabash river; lost.

The was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the committee then took up the Senate bill, entitled "an act supplementary to the act, entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a substitute for the whole bill, being the House bill, and went on, at some length, to explain its provisions.

Mr. POLK followed in support of the original bill, when Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

The hour of three having arrived, the committee rose, and the House took the usual recess till half past 4 o'clock.

[EVENING SESSION.]

On the re-assembling of the House it went into a Committee of the Whole, as a matter of course, on the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States.

The question pending was on the substitute offered by Mr. ROBERTSON.

The debate was continued by Messrs. THOMAS, ROBERTSON, HOAR, BELL, and LINCOLN, when the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON was disagreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY moved an amendment, to change the time of meeting at Williamsport, Pennsylvania, which was disagreed to.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana, after some remarks, moved an amendment making a change in the sixth judicial district; lost.

Mr. GARLAND then moved an amendment providing for the appointment of a judge for the western district of Louisiana.

On motion of Mr. WARDWELL, the committee rose and reported the two bills to the House.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, and the chairman of the committee having reported the harbor and judiciary bills to the House.

The "harbor bill" was taken up, and the chairman propounded the question on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN of New York demanded the previous question, but subsequently withdrew it.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were then agreed to, and the amendments of the Senate, as so amended, were also concurred in.

JUDICIARY BILL.

The House then took up the bill to amend the judiciary system of the United States, on which

Mr. HAWES moved the previous question, which was seconded, ayes 111, noes not counted, and the main question was ordered without a division.

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, but the House refused them, and the bill was ordered to a third reading without a count, and was then read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENNAN, the House took up the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the amendment of the Senate to the bill to continue the Cumberland road; which was concurred in.

The House then took up the amendment of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for fortifications, which the Senate had returned to the House, insisting on their amendment, and asking a conference.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a committee of conference, consisting of five (amended to three) members were appointed on the part of the House, and Mr. BELL, Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. CAMBRELENG, were appointed said committee.

The bill for the relief of George F. Strother was read a third time and passed.

The bill to incorporate the President and the Directors of the Washington and Georgetown Fire Insurance company, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the more equitable administration of the Navy Pension Fund, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MUILENBERG, [Mr. PIERCE of New Hampshire then temporarily occupying the Chair.]

RESOLVED, UNANIMOUSLY. That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable James K. Polk, for the able, dignified, and important manner with which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

LIGHT-HOUSES.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. SMITH in the Chair, and took up the bill from the Senate, making appropriations for light-houses, light boats, beacon lights, buoys, and dolphins, for the year 1837.

The bill having been gone through, a variety of amendments were submitted, most of which were agreed to.

Mr. DUNLAP then moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, on the ground, he said, of the incongruity of the body of the bill with the second section thereof. The second section was in the following words:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That none of the light-houses, beacon-lights, or buoys, the erection or construction of which is provided for in the preceding section, shall be commenced until an examination shall have been made, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proper site has been selected, and whether public convenience demands the erection or construction thereof. And in every case in which such construction shall not, after due examination, appear to him to be demanded by public convenience, it shall be his duty to report the facts appearing in every such case to the next Congress."

Mr. D. then commented, with considerable warmth, upon the inconsistency of this clause with the body of the bill, which positively located the works in question.

After some further remarks from Messrs. PEARCE of Rhode Island and UNDERWOOD, the motion of Mr. DUNLAP was rejected, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. WARD then moved that the committee take up the Senate bill to increase the military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes; which was agreed to—ayes 74, noes 65.

The bill was then read, (its provisions and details have been heretofore sufficiently given in the proceedings of the Senate,) and taken up by sections.

Mr. HAWES offered a proviso, that no officer should be appointed from the graduates of the West Point Academy.

Mr. HAWES was proceeding to address the committee on his amendment, when he gave way to enable the SPEAKER to resume the Chair, and sign some enrolled bills.

FORTIFICATION BILL—DISTRIBUTION OF THE SURPLUS.

Mr. BELL then asked the general consent of the House to make a report from the Committee of Conference.

Leave being granted—

Mr. BELL rose and said: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Conference, appointed on the part of this House to meet a similar committee appointed by the Senate on their motion, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in relation to the amendment of the Senate which proposed to strike from the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1837, and for other purposes," that clause proposing to distribute the surplus revenue on the first day of January next, report that they have performed the duty assigned them, and have come to no agreement. Mr. B. therefore felt it his duty to report this fact to the House, that it might, if it chose, at this period of the setting, proceed to take such other steps as it should think proper, and he now moved that the House do adhere to their disagreement.

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved that the House recede [which motion took precedence of the other.]

Mr. FRENCH asked for the yeas and nays on this motion, which were ordered, and were—ayes 82, nays 97, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Beaumont, Bockee, Boyce, Boyd, Cambreling, Chapin, Craig, Cramer, Cray, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Farlin, Fowler, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gholson, Grantland, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Holt, Howard, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKee, McKim, McLene, Miller, Mullenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpool, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whiteley, Wise, and Yell—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allen, Heman Allen, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Bunch, John Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, John Chambers, Childs, Nath. H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Everett, Forester, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Hawes, Hazeltine, Heister, Herod, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, James, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Parker, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whiteley, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—97.

So the House refused to recede.

The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. BELL, that the House do adhere to their disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, as this was the last vote that could be taken on this subject, he had merely to state that if the House adhered the bill was lost. [Loud cries of order! order! from several parts of the hall; and if Mr. C. did make any additional remark his voice was entirely drowned by the noise.]

Mr. GRANGER. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had announced that this bill was lost if the House adhered; how did he know that?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I have the assurance from the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BELL remarked that the gentleman's declaration was a most extraordinary one. The committee of three persons on the part of the Senate, or any number of gentlemen of that House, might think that, because that committee could come to no agreement, the body it represented might not. But nothing could be more true, than that the committee of the Senate could not vote for or speak for the whole body of the Senate, or even for a majority of it. They spoke, and spoke only, their own sentiments; the same as the committee on the part of the House spoke their sentiments as a committee. Neither could speak or vote for the whole body or a majority of it, else why the necessity of approving, disapproving, adopting or rejecting their report?

Whatever conversations might have passed when the two committees met, among the members, was, and could be, of course, only conjectural, and was, to say the least of it, in character rather gratuitous. They could not pledge themselves for the vote of the majority they represented. If, however, we were to go into reasoning on probabilities of what might be the result, Mr. B. would say there was possibility, nay strong probability, for arriving at the conclusion that a sufficient number of Senators would change their votes, so as to recede, as he trusted they would; nevertheless, he did not feel himself authorized to make a response of this description, except in answer to the very extraordinary declaration of the gentleman from New York. Mr. B. thought it due to the House that it should sustain its vote, and he hoped they would do so. It was true that they had no discourtesy to complain of on the part of the Senate, but still it was that body which ought now to recede. The House was the representatives, the immediate representatives, of the great body of the American people; and its solemn opinion, three times expressed, at such a period as the present one, by an overwhelming majority, demanded that it should be treated with the utmost deference. He again expressed his earnest hope that it would adhere.

Mr. ADAMS inquired if the gentleman from New York was in order in referring to what had taken place before the Committee of Conference?

The CHAIR (temporarily occupied by Mr. PIERCE of N. H.) said the point ought to have been raised at the time.

Mr. ADAMS had understood the point of order was made, for the gentleman was loudly called to order; and Mr. A. held it to be the duty of the Speaker at once to have arrested the remarks.

The CHAIR had heard no gentleman rise in his place and raise the point of order, or he should have at once entertained it.

Mr. ADAMS. Was it in order for the gentleman from New York to intimate, or to make remarks for the purpose of intimidating the members of this House in the votes they might be about to give?

The CHAIR had not heard any "intimidation" thrown out by the member from New York.

Mr. ADAMS expressed a hope that no member would be influenced by what fell from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, gentlemen might take the responsibility of losing the fortification bill if they pleased. Upon him at least it would not rest, and he should vote to recede.

Mr. PEYTON would merely call the attention of those members of the present body who were members of the last Congress, to the change taken place in the gentleman's doctrine since then. On the night of the third of March, when the memorable three million appropriation was lost, the doctrine of the gentleman then was very different from what he now intimated, and which he wished to impress upon the House, with regard to the course taken by the Senate.

What language did the gentleman then hold? What was then his doctrine? It was that this House should adhere, even if the bill should be lost, and the country left defenceless against the apprehended invasion of a foreign foe. Then it was that this House should do its duty, and let the odious Senate take the responsibility, and the measure was lost. Yes, sir, repeated Mr. P., such was his language—lost at the peril of all the dreadful consequences of war, and every thing that might be expected from a conflict with a foreign enemy, according to the gentleman's estimate of the then perilous condition of the country. "Let the House adhere," the gentleman then vociferated, "and let the Senate assume the responsibility of the loss of the fortification bill."

But now, the majority of that body having changed the gentleman's doctrine has changed with it. Then, if the Senate adhered, the responsibility was to rest upon them; now, if they adhered, the responsibility was to rest upon the House.

Mr. P. concluded by an earnest hope that the House would not recede, for what was the effect of its proposition? Why, that millions upon millions of money would be taken from the Treasury, or rather from the pet banks, or rather from the grasp of the dictator and controller of the pet banks, and distributed among the people to whom it belonged. The effect of the Senate's amendment, was to prevent this from being done. That was the real issue, and the country would decide, on that issue, where the responsibility should rest.

Mr. VANDERPOEL thought it entirely useless to be indulging in recrimination on this subject. He believed every man had made up his mind, and was willing to assume the responsibility, if any there was or would be, in this matter. For his own part he was perfectly ready and willing to take his share of it. He had voted against the proposition, and he believed to be a most obnoxious principle, that of overbalancing all the benefits of the fortification bill. He was also willing to vote against it again, on the same ground, and to assume his share of the responsibility; but believing that speeches would make no converts, he hoped the question would be taken without further debate.

Mr. LANE said it was not his intention to detain the House by an examination of the principles of the amendment; he had voted too often upon the subject involved not to be understood. He had not only voted for the deposit bill of the last session, but had taken the lead in procuring its timely consideration. He had voted, in every instance, in favor of the amendment upon which we are now called to vote for the last time.

The bill called the deposit bill of the last session, sprang from a legitimate source, from one of the standing committees, was a bill connected with but a single other provision near of kin. It was known, officially known, that a large surplus had and would accumulate in the Treasury, beyond the wants of the Government, and there was time for the action of Congress, and an apparent necessity for it. Otherwise, in the present case, it has been introduced as an amendment to the fortification bill; a bill upon which the safety of our commerce, our cities, our people, and the national honor depend—at the close of the session: not a bill of this House, but of the Senate. The Senate has refused to concur. This House has adhered. The Senate again refuse to concur, and, in all due courtesy, have asked a committee of conference. The committee fail to agree; and it now remains to be determined, whether this House will recede; if it does not, the fortification bill, so important to the defence of the country, must fail.

If a pertinacious adherence to the amendment would save the amendment, even at the loss of the fortification bill, there would exist some reason for firmness; but the disagreement has arrived at that point of legislation when, by the force now to be taken on the motion to recede, is to decide the fate of both: to recede is to pass the fortification bill—to refuse is the loss of both. This House must recede, or they sleep together.

Mr. L. said he called upon honorable members to pause and reflect before they gave such a vote; a vote that would not only put a stop to all the public works now in progress, and permit them to fall into decay, but blight the national credit and honor by a breach of national faith. Existing contracts must be violated, for the want of money in the hands of the Executive to fulfil them.

Sir, (said Mr. L.) when does the amendment propose to deposit the surplus revenue? Not until January, 1833.

Mr. L. said he would call upon honorable members to say if any necessity existed for such premature action upon the subject of the surplus revenue. The amendment proposed to distribute in January, 1833, before it can be known whether there will be any to distribute. A war with Mexico, or a protracted one with the Indian tribes, and it would all be swallowed up for national defence. Suppose a large surplus should accumulate, there will be ample time for the next Congress to act upon the subject before the amendment, if adopted, could take effect. Sir, this House has but a few hours to act; the next Congress will have a month. From estimates laid before them, they will be able to act advisedly upon the subject.

Sir, it has been said by honorable members, (and is this the only argument put forth for this obstinate adherence to the amendment?) that unless it shall be adopted, the money will be left in the hands of the Executive, and the pet banks, to corrupt, and purchase the banks and the people? are gentlemen prepared to rest their honor and integrity upon such an argument? an argument contradicted by the very amendment it is urged to sustain. Suppose the amendment should be adopted, will it, can it, have the slightest influence upon the money in the Treasury, before the first of January, 1833? will there be one dollar more or less in the hands of the Executive? Will it change the surplus one single farthing? Surely not: there is no such provision in the amendment: to contend for such a proposition would be more than folly; it would be madness itself. Is there an honorable gentleman upon this floor who will rise and say that it would produce the slightest change in the amount of money in the Treasury; the place to be deposited; the use which may be made of it; that would leave it less in the power or control of the Executive branch of the Government whose duty it is to take charge of it? If any such gentleman has a seat upon this floor, (Mr. L. said,) he called upon him to rise and state in what particular such change would take place—no one has been found to respond, the proposition is then conceded by all. Is it then not our duty to recede, and permit the fortification bill to become a law, and leave the surplus revenue, if any, in the hands of the next Congress, to dispose of in such manner as in their judgment shall be best calculated to promote the public interest? they will have time and estimates before them, and act knowingly upon the subject.

For these reasons, (said Mr. L.) he should vote to recede, and called upon the friends of the fortification bill to follow his example.

Mr. L. said, before he took his seat, he desired to be distinctly understood as not having changed his opinion upon the subject of a surplus revenue. That while he was fully persuaded in his own mind that to pass a law for the purpose of collecting a greater revenue from the people than was necessary for the reasonable and just expenditures of the Government, would be unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional, he was free to state, he had no doubt of the propriety, nay, the duty of Congress, when by existing laws there shall be thrown into the Treasury more than is required for the purposes aforesaid, to return it back to the people in such manner as is best calculated to promote the interests of all. To conclude, said Mr. L. should he be honored with a seat in the next Congress, and a surplus revenue found in the Treasury beyond the wants of the Government, so far as it depended upon his vote, it should be acted upon to meet the just expectations of his constituents.

Mr. MANN of New York expressed a hope that this question was not to be debated again at this late hour, and he therefore demanded the previous question.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I second the motion, for I do hope that it will not be debated any more.

Mr. WISE having called for a division of the House by tellers.

The demand for the previous question was then seconded by the House—ayes 135, and the main question ordered without a division.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, which were ordered, and were yeas 103, nays 57—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Ball, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Forester, Fowler, French, Rice Garland, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hildard Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Hazelton, Heister, Herod, Hear, Hopkins, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Kilgore, Lawrence, Lay, Thomas Lee, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lyon, Job Mann, Sampson Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McComas, McKennan, McLene, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Parker, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, John Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Standeford, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whitesley, Lewis Williams, and Sherrod Williams—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beaumont, Black, Booke, Bovee, Boyd, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Chapin, Craig, Cramer, Cray, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Fulsler, James Garland, Gholson, Glascock, Grantland, Haley, Hamer, Hannegan, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Hutmisan, Ingham, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Kennon, Lane, Lansing, Lawler, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKee, McKim, Miller, Muhlenberg, Page, Parks, Patterson, Patton, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Pinckney, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turrill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Thomas T. Whitesley, Wise, and Yell—57.

So the House determined to adhere to its disagreement to the Senate's amendment, and a message was sent to that body by its Clerk, notifying them of the fact.

Mr. MANN of New York then asked leave to submit a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill for the increase of the army. Though he was in favor, he said, of the bill, yet, being well assured it would occupy the whole residue of this session, he would, for the purpose of proceeding to other business, move to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of that bill, for the purpose of laying it on the table.

Mr. CALHOUN of Kentucky objected, and consequently the House went into Committee of the Whole again, and Mr. HAWES being entitled to the floor, gave way to

Mr. MANN of New York, on whose motion the above bill was laid aside, not to be reported to the House—ayes 80, nays 44.

On motion of Mr. MANN of New York, the committee took up the bill for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to land under the treaty of 1832, with the Choctaw Indians.

There being no motion to amend, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee then took up the bill authorizing the relinquishment of the 16th section for the use of schools, and the entry of other lands in lieu.

Mr. SHIELDS moved an amendment, providing that certain public lands in the State of Tennessee shall be ceded to the State, on conditions therein prescribed.

After some remarks by Messrs. SHIELDS, GHOLSON, HARRIN, DUNLAP, and WILLIAMS of North Carolina,

Mr. MANN of New York moved to lay the bill aside.

Mr. GHOLSON inquired if this motion was in order?

The CHAIRMAN decided that it was in order.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed from that decision, and after some remarks by Messrs. GHOLSON, SHIELDS, LOVE, and CRAIG, the appeal was withdrawn; and the motion to lay the bill aside, was decided in the affirmative—ayes 92, nays 40.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the committee rose and reported the bill making appropriations for light-houses, light boats, &c. and the bill for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to land under the treaty with the Choctaw Indians.

The SPEAKER having resumed the Chair, the bill in relation to the Choctaw Indians, was read a third time and passed.

The House then took up and concurred in the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the light-house bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STORER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were—yeas 103, nays 60.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, the House took up the bill from the Senate, entitled "an act to continue in force for a limited time, the act entitled an act to carry into effect a convention between the United States and Spain," and the same was read a third time and passed.

The bill from the Senate to provide for a more equitable administration of the navy pension fund, having been returned to the Senate with an amendment, that body had sent it back disagreeing with the amendment with the House.

Mr. JARVIS moved that the House insist upon its amendment.

Mr. WISE opposed the motion, Messrs. PARKER and JARVIS sustained it.

Mr. WISE moved that the House recede from its amendment, which motion was disagreed to; and the motion to insist was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Wisconsin, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill laying off certain towns in the Territory of Wisconsin, which was read a third time and passed.

The bill to give the approval of Congress to certain acts of the Legislature of Wisconsin incorporating banks, was then read a third time and passed.

On motion, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CALHOUN of Mass. in the chair, on certain bills.

The committee took up and considered the bill in addition to the act to promote the progress of science and the useful arts, which was reported to the House without amendment, and then read a third time and passed.

The House then went again into committee on the bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions, and

The bill to grant half-pay to widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States; which were considered and laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The "bill to authorize and sanction sales of Creek reservations under the treaty of 1832," was then taken up.

Mr. VINTON opposed the bill, and moved to lay it aside; which motion was warmly opposed by

Mr. LEWIS, who made a brief explanation of its provisions, and showed the justice and necessity of its passage, both for the benefit of the Indians themselves, as well as the whites, when

Mr. VINTON'S motion was disagreed to without a division.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out the words "widows and administrators," in the section authorizing the President of the United States to confirm such sales as were made by them; but subsequently modified his motion so as to strike out the whole of the second section applying to the sales by widows, children, heirs, &c.

Mr. BELL gave an explanation of the reason which had induced the Committee on Indian Affairs to insert that section, and said it was a most complicated question, so as to steer between the apparently or obviously conflicting provisions of the Creek treaty and the laws of Alabama.

Mr. LEWIS explained that the object of this bill was to harmonize the conflicting provisions referred to, and the very section proposed to be stricken out, had been inserted for the express purpose of protecting the rights of the Indians.

The motion to strike out the provision that the lands should not be sold for less than $1.25 per acre; lost—ayes 48 nays 52.

On motion of Mr. CHAPIN, the committee then rose and reported the foregoing bills to the House.

The bill to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to grant half-pay to widows and orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States being taken up.

Mr. VINTON moved to lay it on the table. Lost without a count.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

The bill to authorize and sanction the sale of Creek reservations being on its third reading.

Mr. VINTON moved to lay it on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the motion being decided in the negative, the bill was read a third time and passed.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the "bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause the public vessels to cruise upon the coast in the winter season, and to relieve distressed navigators."

The Clerk was proceeding to read the above bill, when Mr. WISE rose and raised the question that it was 12 o'clock at night, a period when many gentlemen had declared it as their conscientious opinion that the constitutional existence of that body ceased, though he did not, for he thought their powers remained till 12 o'clock M. of the fourth.

After some further remarks from Messrs. CHAMBERS of Ky. WISE, and DROMGOOLE.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD the committee rose and reported.

On motion of Mr. SMITH it was Ordered, That a committee be appointed on the part of the House, in conjunction with such committee as the Senate may appoint, to wait upon the President, and notify him that unless he has some other communication to make the two Houses are ready to adjourn.

On motion of Mr. SMITH,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate informing that the House was ready to adjourn.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report, by which it appears that the statements in relation to commerce and navigation are about being finally closed, but will not be done in time enough to transmit to the House before its adjournment, and suggesting the propriety of authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to have them printed.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, this report was laid on the table, and 10,000 extra copies of the annual report on commerce and navigation was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting a report from the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, of the balances due from late postmasters, as shown by the books of that department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Colonel of Ordnance, furnishing certain information in relation to armories; laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 15th ultimo, covering a report and detailed statement prepared by the Adjutant General, in relation to officers of the army, who were employed on duty which separated them from their corps; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VINTON then submitted a resolution, directing the printing of 5,000 copies of Featherstonhaugh's geological reconnaissance; which was disagreed to.

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, the House reconsidered the vote by which certain members of body, who had been brought before the House during a call of the House, had been excused on paying fees; and the vote being again taken, they were excused without paying fees.

Mr. SMITH, from the joint committee, appointed to wait on the President, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress, having finished the business before them, were now ready to adjourn, unless he had some further communication to make, reported that they had performed the duty assigned to them; and were answered by the President, that he had no other official communication to make, but that he had charged him to say, that it was his wish of his heart, that each member of Congress might enjoy health and prosperity in this world, and happiness in the world to come.

Mr. PATTON moved that this House adjourn sine die.

The SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: The Twenty-fourth Congress has now closed its deliberations, and being about to be dissolved, I seize the moment of our separation to return to this House my profound acknowledgments for the many evidences I have had of your indulgent kindness, and generous confidence and support, during the period I have presided over your deliberations; but more especially do I return to you my sincere thanks for the vote you have been pleased this day to pass, approving my official conduct in the Chair. No language, gentlemen, can adequately convey the deep sense of gratitude which this testimonial of your good opinion has excited in my breast. The gratification which it has afforded is the greater, because the resolution which you have passed conveys the voluntary and deliberately expressed opinions of gentlemen, with many of whom I have been long associated here; all of whom have been the eye witnesses of my conduct as the presiding officer of this House, and whose friendship, esteem, and confidence, I shall cherish to the latest hour of my life.

I entered upon the duties of this high station with a full sense of the responsibility which must often devolve upon me, and with the fixed purpose, if I know my own heart, so to discharge those duties as to merit the respect and good opinion of this House, and the approbation of the country. I have had no other desire, than that the rules and parliamentary laws by which our proceedings are regulated, should be properly expounded and correctly administered. It is due to candor to say, that the steady and unwavering support which you have upon all occasions given me, has alone enabled me successfully to discharge the duties assigned me. The anxiety and solicitude which I have often felt, and especially in seasons of great political excitement, from which our deliberations have not been exempt, to perform my duty, not only with faithfulness, but acceptably to the House and to the country, can be known and appreciated only by him who has filled this Chair. Amidst the embarrassments and difficulties which have often surrounded me, it has given me pleasure, upon all occasions, to court the advice and correction of the House if I erred; and it is a source of the highest gratification to me to know that, upon the numerous occasions when the House has been appealed to, to affirm or reverse the official decisions which it was my duty to make, you have promptly given me your support. I am not vain enough to believe that I have passed through the many trying occasions which have occurred, in the course of our deliberations, during which many difficult, and often novel questions of parliamentary law and practice, have been suddenly presented for instantaneous decision, without having often fallen into error. If, however, I have erred, I trust it has not been on points material; I know it has not been intentional; and the approbation of my official conduct which you have this day expressed, affords the highest proof that you have generously overlooked my errors, and done more than justice to the unwearied efforts I have made to merit your good opinion, and, so far as depended on my official acts, to promote the interests of our constituents.

If gentlemen, in the course of our deliberations, as the representatives of the nation, there has been occasional excitement or feeling, growing out of political collisions, the natural offspring of honest differences of opinion, now that we are about to separate, many of us never again to meet in this hall, or "this side the grave," may we not hope that all recollection of unpleasant incidents that are passed, may be forgotten, and that each of us, whatever may be his future destiny, may devote himself to the advancement of the best interests of our country. In taking leave of you, gentlemen, I wish you a safe return to your families and friends, and my prayer is, that the blessings of an overruling Providence may rest upon all.

And now it only remains for me to perform the last duty assigned me, by the adjournment of this House; and, accordingly, I announce that this House stands adjourned without day.

R. M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

DEFERRED PROCEEDINGS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, Feb. 17, 1837.

The House resumed the examination of witnesses in the case of R. M. Whitney, for an alleged contempt of the House in not appearing before a Select Committee of the House of which H. A. WISE is chairman.

The following interrogatory was pending when the House last adjourned. Mr. MCKEON had objected to it, and briefly stated the grounds of his objection; and Mr. PEYTON had replied at some length; and the remarks of both gentlemen have already appeared in the proceedings in the Globe.

First question by Mr. PEYTON. Do you understand from your knowledge of the sentiments of the members of this House that their chief object in supporting and bringing Mr. Whitney before the House, for an alleged contempt of its authority, was to lay the circumstances of the occurrence in the committee room before the world; and from all you know on that subject, do you believe that such was the object of any portion of the members of this House? If yes, state all the facts and circumstances upon which that understanding and belief rests.

Mr. PEYTON now withdrew this interrogatory, and substituted the following in its place.

First question by Mr. PEYTON. Have you heard any member of this House declare that any proceeding should be adopted or prosecuted to bring the occurrences in the committee, on the 25th of January, to the notice of the House? and if yes, state whether you have heard such an opinion expressed by many of the members of the House; and also, whether any of them suggested that proceedings against R. M. Whitney, for a contempt, would be a proper mode of effecting that object.

Mr. TURRILL said he was under the necessity of objecting to this interrogatory, as he considered it a very improper inquiry to make.

Mr. PEYTON rose to a question of order. He desired to know whether it was in order to object to an interrogatory after the witness had returned his answer.

The CHAIR said it was in order to object at any time before the answer was received and recorded.

Mr. TURRILL said he was not now prepared to discuss this question; and if he was prepared to argue the point, he should consider it would be trespassing upon the patience of the House to adduce a single argument to show that a question making an inquiry into the views and intentions of members of that House, was not a proper one to be put to the witness. Every gentleman must see what such questions as this must lead to.

It was too plain a proposition to need any argument to make a large majority of the members of that House vote against it.

Mr. PEYTON said he had not heard the objections made to this interrogatory by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Terrill.) He considered the interrogatory a proper one, as the object of it was to ascertain whether this investigation was brought before the House, because the witness was alarmed; and whether from fear and alarm, he dare not make his appearance before the committee; or whether this investigation, so far as the witness was concerned, had been got up with a view to harass members of that House; and whether such a course had not been taken by the witness in concert, and aided and abetted by members of that House. Now, if they establish the fact, that the witness was not afraid, and that that was not his motive in coming before the House; but that his object was a very different one, and that he and all concerned had only got up this farce for the purpose of operating on certain members of that House, he asked if it would not add to the contempt of this witness. He considered it a proposition too plain to be argued, and as he had given his views on this subject last evening, he did not desire to repeat them.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—YEAS 59, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Chilton, Allan, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Dunlap, Forester, Granger, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Hillard Hall, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Herod, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, William Jackson, Jones, Jenifer, John W. Jones, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lyon, Sampson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Turner, Underwood, Vinton, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Yell, and Young—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Black, Booke, Boon, Borden, Boyce, Boyd, Briggs, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Elmer, Farlin, French, Fry, Galbraith, Gholson, Hale, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, Joseph Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Keaton, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Abijah Mann, Joe Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKee, McKim, McLene, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Page, Parker, Patterson, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Seymour, Shinn, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thompson, Tousey, Turritt, Vanderpool, Webster, Weeks, and T. T. Whiteside—85.

So the House determined the interrogatory should be put.

Mr. HAMER then sent to the Chair the following

Answer.—I have heard some members say that the proceedings alluded to ought to be brought before the House; that opinion has not been expressed to me by many members. I have not heard any one say, so far as I now recollect, that proceedings against R. M. Whitney, for a contempt, would be a proper mode of effecting that object.

First interrogatory by Mr. WISE.—From the facts within your knowledge, or from remarks made to you, or in your presence, by members of this House, or by R. M. Whitney, have you a doubt of the fact, that this investigation was, and is intended, by said members, and said Whitney, to affect Messrs. Wise and Peyton? State all the facts and circumstances, the conversations and meetings, the remarks of members, or of said Whitney, which go to show that such is the object of those concerned in the same.

Mr. BOON said he objected to this interrogatory, and said he would state his reasons in a single sentence. Mr. Whitney was not brought before that House by the friends of the administration, but he was brought there by the action of the chairman of the select committee (Mr. Wise) himself.

Mr. WISE said he had the same reason for putting this inquiry that his friend from Tennessee had, for he felt, equally with that gentleman, that he was there on his trial. Yes, sir, (said Mr. W.) it is I who am on trial, and not Reuben M. Whitney, and I cannot ask you, or this House, to excuse me from voting upon any question. And for that very reason, that the issue is made, as I understand it, by this House, whether I am so much of an assassin that a peaceful mandate not come into a committee room where I am? Sir, I have not a doubt of the contrivance, no more than my friend has, to make this issue before the country. Sir, I propose this as an inducing inquiry, first as to the members of this House; and I intend, by subsequent questions, to go further. I wish to know, sir, if there are not other officers of this Government who have issued the order that the power of this House, and the Executive power of the country, are both to be brought to bear upon two humble and inexperienced members of the House of the representative body. Sir, I have felt it. I have felt that I was to be killed off before the country, for being, what has been designated "a troublesome fellow." And these, yes, these very parties, who are now defending Whitney with such strict adherence to every principle of justice that, while he is arraigned and informed of the nature of the accusation against him, and has the privilege of examining witnesses, these very parties, I say, have violated every principle of justice towards us they have contended for in regard to this individual, by trying me without accusation, without a definite charge, without notice of trial, without arraigning or without my being asked whether I am guilty or not guilty. Sir, this is of the very essence of the transaction; and I must confess, and I do it boldly, that, at the same time gentlemen thus attempt, and desire to try me indirectly, they shall submit to the same ordeal themselves of being tried indirectly. Is it true, that the great champions of justice in this House are about to try a man without accusation or notice of it? without the power of summoning his witnesses, and confronting his accuser? Is it possible that those who are being tried, are to be denied the rights of the very criminal? Shall not I and my friend be permitted to stand upon an equal footing of justice? Sir, I wish to know who are my accusers. I wish for various reasons that are unnecessary now to be named. For one thing, in particular, I want to know it. I want to know if there are among the representatives of the people, those who have become such a subject, superserviceable slaves as to obey the mandate of the President. I want to know, too, who are the brave champions of justice here, who make accusations, and urge them on in this indirect manner, and to see if they will take upon themselves the high honor of standing forth openly as accusers. This, sir, is my object. I say then, in conclusion, carry it out. Let us try all. Yes, if any are to be tried, let us try all who are or may be guilty, and ascertain their guilt according to its extent and magnitude.

Mr. ANTHONY rose and commenced saying: Mr. Speaker, it is evident to my mind—when he was interrupted by loud cries of "order!" and the Chair intimated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that under the order adopted by the House, only two speeches could be heard on each interrogatory.

Mr. TURRILL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 73, nays 99, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, N. H. Claiborne, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dunlap, Evans, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Granger, Graves, Griffin, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Howell, Huntsman, James, Jenifer, Lawler, Lawrence, Lea, Love, Lyon, Maury, McKennan, Milligan, Montgomery, Morris, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Reed, Richards, Rogers, William B. Sutherland, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standerfer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Underwood, J. White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Yell, and Young—73.

NAYS—Messrs. H. Allen, Anthony, Ash, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, George Chambers, Chapman, Chappin, C. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Farin, French, Fry, Galbraith, Grantland, Haley, J. Hall, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, Joseph Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Kingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, Sampson Mason, May, McKee, McKim, McLene, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Page, Parker, Patterson, Pearson, Phelps, Potts, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Robertson, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpool, Vinton, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, and T. T. Whitley—99.

So the House determined the interrogatory should not be put. Second interrogatory by Mr. WISE. Do you know, of your own knowledge, or from information derived from the President himself, or any member or members with whom he may have consulted or advised, or to whom he may have suggested an opinion, as to the proceedings upon the report of the Select Committee, whether he, the President of the United States, has not advised and recommended to members the course which has been pursued by the House in this matter of alleged contempt; and whether he did or did not, directly or indirectly, assign as a reason for that course, that it would try the conduct of Messrs. Peyton and Wise in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman, urging that it was necessary to condemn that conduct.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to this interrogatory, and briefly gave his grounds. He did not know that the President of the United States was then on trial there, but believed the only person at the bar of the House was Mr. Whitney. Indeed, Mr. V. doubted very much whether, if they were to go into any conversations of the President, they would throw any light upon the main point in this case, which was, what were the merits or demerits of Reuben M. Whitney, and whether he is actually in contempt or not towards the House. If, however, the gentleman who propounded that question could satisfy Mr. V. that the answer to it would probably throw any light upon the point at issue, he might then be prevailed upon to withdraw his objection; but unless the gentleman succeeded in doing that, Mr. V. must respectfully adhere to it.

Mr. WISE, in reply, said he knew, as well as the gentleman, sir, that the President of the United States is not at the bar of this House; nor am I, sir, at the bar of this House. But yet, sir, I am, to all intents and purposes, as much under trial as (and for a much more heinous offence, too, than) the accused, as he is called, who sits at the bar of the House. He is to be tried for a mere petty misdemeanor. I am to be tried, as I understand, for the motives of an assassin.

Mr. Speaker, I am, sir, under trial now before this House, and before the country. I know it, I feel it, and all I ask of gentlemen is, to let me know who is my accuser. Where is he? High or low, base or honored, a mere tool and minion of power, or a tyrant himself, I call for him; I call for my accuser. In a land of civil liberty, to those who preach this very doctrine, that an accused shall have an accuser, and an accusation, and a witness to confront him, appeal for the production of my accuser. Where is he? Gentlemen tell me, Ah! the President is not on his trial. All I ask of gentlemen is that they let me know, not whether the President be on his trial, but whether he has put me upon my trial? Whether he has called some young and gallant gentlemen of this House to his aid, and shed tears to him, and said he had not a friend to protect his reputation or his gray hairs? That there are two bullies in this House, who are continually trampling upon his reputation, and denouncing his administration, and that "There are none so poor as do him reverence."

He once had friends, but now—now he is about retiring from office, it is necessary to kill off these two men; yes, Mr. Speaker, "kill off" is the word.

And how is this to be done? Why they are to be indirectly tried as assassins, and indirectly condemned as assassins by the verdict of this House.

Sir, I can not speak as I feel I have a right to speak to this House as a jury trying me, but I want to know and find out how many base born tools of a tyrant will do his bidding, and obey his mandates. Sir, have I not a right to speak thus? Have I not a right to make this demand? A tyrannical thus to be wielded? Are the willing slaves to such tyranny to set at defiance an inquiring committee of this House? Have we arrived at this stage of worse than Turkish despotism? Sir, I submit it to this House, to its sense of justice, and I appeal to every sentiment of love for freedom and right, to award me what I ask. The people of this country know not the mammoth power at work against their liberties; how secret and insidious, and sometimes bold and open, is the tyrannical power which is now rapping the very first principles of the Government. If, however, I can merely put the public mind upon inquiry, upon search, upon investigation, I shall be content. I shall have done a patriot's work, and shall meet a patriot's reward—not office, sir, not leaves and fishes, not the spoils of your Treasury, but the spontaneous approval of a free people. Mr. Speaker, before this transaction is ended, I expect it will be your painful duty to reprimand the humble individual now addressing you, to send me back to my constituents with a reprimand, but I can say for them, that they will send me back here to speak proudly and independently, freely as I do, and as I feel it is my duty to do.

Mr. VANDERPOEL asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 67, nays 111—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bond, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dunlap, Gholson, Glascock, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hard, Harper, Hazeltine, Henderson, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, James, Jenifer, Luke Lea, Love, Sampson Mason, Maury, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Montgomery, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Russell, William B. Shepard, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standerfer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Young—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Anthony, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Chappin, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Corwin, C. Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Farin, French, French, Fry, Galbraith, Graham, Grantland, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, William Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKay, McKee, McKim, McLene, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Page, Parks, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Ripley, Robertson, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Turner, Turrill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Thomas T. Whitley, and Yell—111.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not propounded to the witness.

Second interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON.—Have you heard any members of this House, and if yes, who, state that they hoped or wished Whitney would refuse to appear before the committee so as to give an opportunity to examine into the transaction before the committee, or any word or expression to that effect; and have you known any members of this House, and if yes, who, state that they had counseled with Whitney as to the course he should pursue; or have you known any member of this House counsel with said Whitney as to the course to be pursued by him either before the House or the committee? State fully all you know on this subject.

Mr. TURRILL objected to this interrogatory.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 75, nays 91.

So the House determined that this interrogatory should not be put.

Third interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON. Have you heard any member of this House, and if yes, who, stated that by commencing this proceeding against Whitney in the House, the whole conduct and declarations of Messrs. Wise and Peyton would be proven, and thereby bring them, as far as possible, into disgrace before the nation; or any expressions or declarations to that effect; and that they would vote for the investigation with a view to that object?

Mr. ANTHONY objected to this question. He did so, he said, because the same objection applied to it as applied to two or three other questions of the same character, which the House had as frequently sustained, viz: whether the declarations of a member of the House should be given in evidence in this investigation. On this ground he objected to all such questions. If any member had made a declaration, his testimony would be the best in relation to it, but hearsay testimony was not evidence; and he should insist upon his objection to it. He added, that, in his opinion, it was unnecessary to go into any discussion upon it at that time, and should content himself with raising the point.

Mr. PEYTON replied, that if the statement of a judge or a juror could be proven for the purpose of disqualifying him for a seat upon the trial, if any one of the judges or jurors had disqualified himself, he had an undoubted right to prove, and then, he hoped, the House at least would silence that juror or judge. The gentleman says it is "hearsay testimony." Sir, (said Mr. P.) I ask from whom? Why, from the very party I wish and expect to show has disqualified himself from acting in the high capacity of my trier. What, sir! shall members of this body sit in judgment, in a high court of impeachment as the House of Representatives has now resolved itself, and have among it unworthy triers, who have, as triers, disqualified themselves? And, if such be the fact, have they not disgraced themselves before the House and the nation from having acted as prosecutors in the case? Why, sir, was it ever heard of before that a prosecutor could be also a witness, a judge, and a trier in a case? Now, if I can show that such is the condition of any gentleman in this body, I claim the right to do it, and to move that he at least shall be set aside for want of competency to try the case.

Mr. INGERSOLL then asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 69, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, C. Allan, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Borden, Buchanan, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Nath. H. Claiborne, Clark, Crane, Cushing, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Evans, Forrester, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hester, Herod, Hopkins, Howell, Huntsman, Ingersoll, James, Joseph Johnson, Lawler, Luke Lea, Love, Lyon, Mercer, Morgan, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Richardson, Robertson, Russell, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standerfer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Vinton, Washington, Webster, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Young—69.

man, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Efner, Farin, Fowler, French, Galbraith, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Haynes, Hoar, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, William Jackson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, B. Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKim, McLene, Miller, Moore, Page, Parks, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpool, Wagener, Wardwell, Thos. T. Whitley, and Yell—85.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not put.

Fourth interrogatory by Mr. PEYTON.—When did you first see the written statement of Mr. Fairfield, which he presented to this House in answer to the first interrogatory propounded to him, or the substance of the same?

Answer.—Several days before he was examined as a witness in this House; but the exact date I do not remember. I believe the one shown to me then to be substantially the one presented here when he was examined.

Interrogatory by Mr. GHOLSON. Suppose the majority of this House had refused all inquiry into the matter of R. M. Whitney's alleged contempt, or to bring him to the bar on the charge of such contempt in the report of the committee whereof the Hon. Mr. Wise is chairman, "Do you understand, or believe, from your knowledge of the sentiments of any of the members of this House," that the Hon. Messrs. Wise and Peyton, and other members of this House, would have charged the majority with being "coadjutors of the accused," or with having "assumed the position of associates of R. M. Whitney," by the direction of the President of the United States?

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to this question.

Mr. STORER said he hoped the gentleman from New York would withdraw his objection. Surely one of the majority of this House ought not to object to a question coming from the quarter this did.

Mr. GHOLSON said, in propounding this interrogatory, he begged leave to state to the House that he had objected to bringing the accused before the House, and he had been opposed to the institution of this inquiry; but as the matter was now before the House, and as the gentleman from Tennessee, and the gentleman from Virginia, insisted that they were on their trial, he considered it was due to them to have the whole matter investigated. The honorable gentleman had charged that there was a conspiracy formed with the accused, and for one he was willing that they should have all the facts so far as they related to him; he was willing to take his share of the responsibility. He did not believe that the charge which had been made could be proven on that floor; but as these honorable gentleman insisted that they were upon their trial, he was willing that they should know who it was that brought them into this predicament; whether it was the dominant party or the one opposed to it that brought about this state of things. He wished to know whether it was the Van Buren or the anti-Van Buren party who had instituted this proceeding against Mr. Whitney. If, however, these gentlemen wished to change the issue, and to put themselves upon trial, he was unwilling that this charge should apply to him or his friends. He was amongst the youngest members on that floor, and he had heard the insidious assertion, made by honorable gentlemen, that the President had issued his orders to some young and gallant spirit in that House to defend him from the aspersions of two members, who were bullies, in the House. Now, so far as this related to himself, he could truly say that, since his childhood, he had spoke to the President but once. He truly had the sin to answer for of having been the friend of the President from his boyhood, and he would here say he was not ashamed of such a leader.

It seemed to him that gentlemen were taking advantage of their situation on that floor to make assertions of this kind, of which they had no proof; assertions that honorable gentlemen men to shield themselves behind such assertions when they should not make, and would not make, in any other situation. He repelled such charges, and was unwilling to permit gentlemen had not a single particle of proof to sustain them; it was sometimes very convenient for gentlemen, after they had fully committed themselves by a set of broad assertions, to sustain which they had not a single particle of testimony, to shield themselves by offering to prove what they well knew the good sense of the House would not permit them to prove, and which they could not prove if they were permitted to try. He repelled such charges, and challenged gentlemen to an investigation of the matter, so far as he was concerned. He denied that he had any consultation or combination, either with the President, or any other human being, as to the course he should pursue on this subject; neither had he consulted the party in power, nor the party who had brought this investigation into the House. Who was it that placed the honorable gentleman from Tennessee and the honorable gentleman from Virginia upon their trial, as they would have it they were upon their trial? He did not understand that they were on their trial; but as they were actors in a scene which had occurred in connection with the accused, it was necessary the truth of that occurrence should come to light, and an investigation must be made into the conduct of the whole of the select committee on that occasion. Then he did not think these gentlemen could be presumed to be on their trial, further than was necessary to show whether Whitney had been guilty of a contempt of the House, in refusing to appear before that committee. Who was it that had instituted this proceeding? It had been brought about by the means of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee and the honorable gentleman from Virginia. Had the President consulted with his political friends in relation to it? He would tell gentlemen that so far as a young member was concerned, he was perfectly willing to meet the charge; but as far as the gentleman had alluded to him in his remark that the President had issued his orders to defend him from bullies on that floor, his insinuation was gratuitous and unfounded, come from whom it might. They were there trying the conduct of Mr. Whitney; and if the conduct of honorable gentlemen was brought in in connection with that, it could not be helped. If their conduct had been proper, they certainly would have no objection to its being made public; and if improper, it was necessary it should be investigated. He scorned the idea that the President or the dominant party in that House had entered into a conspiracy against the honorable gentlemen from Tennessee and Virginia. He believed that the gentlemen were assuming an importance for themselves on this subject, to which they were not entitled. He denied that the opposition of any two individuals, however respectable they might be in themselves, or honorable in their office, were of so much importance, that it was necessary they should be kill'd off.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 50, nays 96, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Burch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Clark, Crane, Darlington, Dunlap, Evans, Forester, Gholson, Glascock, Graham, Grandland, Grennell, Griffin, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Haynes, Hazeltine, Henderson, Holster, Howell, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Jenifer, Lawler, Lay, Luke Lea, Love, Lyon, Sampson Mason, Maury, Mercer, James A. Pearce, Pearson, Pettigrew, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Young—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Bean, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Farlan, French, Fry, Haley, J. Hall, Hawkins, Hoar, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Ingham, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Loyall, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, May, McKay, McKim, McLene, Miller, Moore, Page, Parks, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, John Raynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpool, Wardwell, Webster, Thomas T. Whitelsey, and Yell—96.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not put.

[Cross-examination of the Hon. THOMAS L. HAMER.]

Interrogatory by Mr. GLASCOCK. Do you or not know of any members of this House having formed and expressed an opinion in relation to the guilt or innocence of the accused? If yea, please state them.

Mr. CRAIG objected to this question, on the ground that it fell within the principle which had been decided by the House, over and over again, by yeas and nays.

Mr. GLASCOCK said, whatever might have or had been the decision of the House in relation to a question of this kind, so well satisfied was he that it was a proper one, that he felt it his duty to make some remarks in support of it.

Mr. G. looked upon it as a settled principle in this country, and before all tribunals that, wherever there is or has been, an expression of opinion by any trier before any tribunal, that trier renders himself incompetent, at least not competent, to decide a question of such importance as would bring an accused before any tribunal. Now, so far as this question is concerned, continued he, whatever may be its fate, whether sustained or rejected by the House, he believed that if there had been expressions, or any expression, of opinion on the part of members, or of any members of that House, in relation to the guilt or innocence of the accused, it would at least be a warning to individuals in that body, under such circumstances, to abstain from doing so in future. He looked upon it as highly improper for any individual member of the House, from the very moment an investigation is ordered into the conduct of a citizen, to form or express any opinion until the whole of the facts were fairly elicited, both sides fairly heard, and the case left for judgment upon the facts brought out in evidence; and even then that opinion should be made up, and made up alone, upon the testimony that may have been adduced. Whenever an individual proceeded to do otherwise than this, Mr. G. himself looked upon it as highly improper. It might be that, in responding to this question, there would be found some who had expressed an opinion, as well of the guilt as of the innocence of the accused. If, however, there were any such persons in that assembly, the fact should be made known to the House, in order that it might place itself in a situation to judge fairly in deciding the case.

In looking (said Mr. G.) to the history of all judicial proceedings, and all proceedings of the kind under consideration, it would be found that one of the rights secured to the citizen and to the prosecutor, and always guaranteed to him, was the preliminary question, "Have you formed and expressed any opinion in relation to the guilt or innocence of the accused?" This was a sacred right secured to the prosecutor and to the citizen, in order that, in all trials of such a character as were criminal in their nature, they might have a fair, unbiased, and impartial trial. It was well known by every gentleman familiar with these transactions that, in criminal prosecutions, it had been decided that this question was a proper one, and either party had the right to resort to it. The answer decided always the competency of the juror or trier. Mr. G. then would respectfully ask, if that principle ought not to be carried out there? Ought they not to try the accused with their minds unbiased and unprejudiced? If so, and who could gainsay it, was not the question a proper one?

Mr. G. would candidly state that he did not himself know that any one had either formed or expressed such opinion, whether in private conversation or elsewhere, in relation to the guilt or innocence of the accused, but if there was any one who had, he himself it made known; nay, he should be willing himself, if gentlemen thought proper, that every member of the House should be called upon the stand, and asked the question as to whether he stood indifferent between the parties. This was the course that ought to be pursued, in order that the country might not charge every opinion and every vote given by the representatives of the people as being swayed by party feelings or motives. This was the course he, for himself, would be glad to see adopted before that tribunal, consistent, as it would be, with the practice before all other tribunals. He hoped, however, that, be the fate of the question he had propounded what it might, it would have the effect of preventing members thereafter from expressing their opinions in relation to cases of this importance when on trial.

Mr. G. would also take that occasion to remark, that the wide range this investigation had taken, had induced him to vote for numerous questions put by the two gentlemen from Virginia and Tennessee, (Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton.) He must, however, be permitted to say that, so far as related to the gentleman from Tennessee, he hesitated not to declare that the investigation was in strict opposition to all former practice on such occasions. So far as related to the conduct of that gentleman, they had nothing whatever to do; though he was free to admit that the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia was properly before the House, but was only so because it furnished part of the defence of the accused, and because the issue was whether that gentleman's conduct was such as to justify the contents of Mr. Whitney's letter. The letter makes that issue, and so far as the gentleman from Virginia was connected with it, this investigation, as to him, might be proper; but he disclaimed the right of that House to go into an investigation of the conduct of the member from Tennessee, for that gentleman was in no way connected with this transaction. It had been justly and properly observed, that so far as related to these transactions before the select committee they should have been reported, all the facts as they occurred, to the House, yet, instead of doing that, they were making wrong issues. Instead of trying Mr. Whitney for contempt, they were, to all intents and purposes, from the latitude already taken, trying the conduct of Messrs. Wise and Peyton.

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman from Georgia that members must be designated by their States.

Mr. GLASCOCK begged pardon, and would only add a few words in conclusion. He would simply state that he did believe, so far as precedent was concerned, it would be a good precedent to establish to decide in favor of putting the question he had proposed. Good precedents were of great value, both to that House and to the country, and they could not do better than by establishing one then. It never could be commenced too soon. Whether it would make against or in favor of the accused, was a matter of indifference to Mr. G.; all he desired to see, was that they would establish the precedent that no person should be compelled to vote, or, if compelled, his decision should be taken with great caution, before the whole of the evidence was heard. He was confident much good would result from it, and it would furnish another Congress with the necessity of being cautious in the expression of opinion, before the testimony on both sides was heard, if any such had been expressed on the present occasion. It was not for him to say there had, and he hoped, for the honor and character of the House, it had not; but, if it had been done, he, for one, whether it came from one against the administration, or in favor of it, would wish to know it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Kentucky wished to ask the gentleman from Georgia, which of the accused he meant?

Mr. GLASCOCK. Of course I referred to Mr. Whitney as the accused.

The question was then lost without a division, and the House accordingly determined that the interrogatory be not put.

Third interrogatory by Mr. DAWSON.—Do you not consider this investigation, from the direction given it by the House, entirely irrelevant, and well calculated to bring into disrepute this branch of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. BOON said, I object to that interrogatory, Mr. Speaker, on the ground of its laying open the whole conduct of the House, and has nothing to do with the pending issue.

Mr. DAWSON said: Mr. SPEAKER, I have propounded this question to the House, not out of any disrespect to the body generally, or to any gentleman in it; but, sir, it is, it must be, apparent to every member who composes this branch of the Congress of the United States, that this whole proceeding is well calculated to bring this House into disrepute. Sir, let me respectfully ask, where is the member upon this floor who does not feel himself lessened in his own estimation, by the position he is driven to occupy before the American people? If, however, this procedure is to be carried out in the way it has been commenced, I wish it to be placed on the records of this House, that, if it should go forth to the people I have the honor in part to represent, it should be seen that I have taken the bold, fearless, and independent stand, in the presence of the House, to announce this my private and individual opinion. Sir, it seems, as it were, that by common consent we are led on, from question to question, that never can by possibility lead to the public good, nor to any other result than that of impugning the character of members of this House, and finally to bring the body itself into a state of excitement, and feeling that may end, if not in disgrace, at least in a manner to be deplored by all.

Sir, I beg this House not to misunderstand me. I intend no imputation upon the body to which I belong, but I feel myself impelled, by self-respect, to announce to this body that I consider this whole proceeding well calculated to bring us to the consequences and deductions which that question propounds. Sir, let me ask, through you, what object have they in going into collateral matters affecting the conduct of members of this body? What action is proposed or intended by it? What direction is designed to be given to it? Sir, I hesitate not to aver that, when our proceedings go forth to them, the American people will pronounce us as mere chess-players, striving to checkmate particular members of this body, in order to place them in an attitude before the country by which they may either fall or rise. Sir, when a body like this thus suffers itself to be led astray, it is high time that some one should rise and endeavor to arrest or check it. Let me ask, where is the man within those galleries, or who is now lounging in your lobbies, that will not proclaim it immediately to our constituents, and inquire, in the name of the character of this Republic, what kind of a farce is this we are now playing? What must be my reply, sir? Why, that it is a farce derogating in its character, and almost contemptible, if I may, without disrespect, make use of such an expression. We are looked upon here as what? As mere tools or puppets. I was almost going to say, but as mere individuals, marching backwards and forwards, answering to our names, and taking directions for political effect. That is the sum total, the plain matter of fact.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike making these observations; they are painfully wrung from me, but they are my true opinions. I have waited, hoping that some one of the older members with whom I have conversed, and who have not only avowed the same opinions to me, but have assured me they looked upon this scene with feelings not only of disgust, but with feelings calculated even to degrade them in their own estimation. Sir, it is time this matter should be arrested, and I sincerely trust it may be.

Mr. Speaker, I ask pardon of the House, if they think the question I propound contains an insinuation, for it is far from my intention. In due time, if permitted to do so, I shall follow it up with another, for the purpose of endeavoring to bring this House from an issue with two of its worthy members, and ask the witness whether he knows of any act or cause calculated to place Mr. Whitney in a condition that he ought not to appear before that committee. That is the question, and the only question before this body, or that ought to be before this body. Yet what have you been doing? You have been to the White House, you have been to the committee, and for what purpose?

Why, merely to gain an advantage over two worthy gentlemen not on their trial, spread it before this community, and through it to the country at large, thereby bringing the whole Union into contempt and disgrace; and we are to be not only the aiders and abettors, but the sole cause of this! We, the selected representatives of the sovereign people of this country, taking into our own hands this mean, petty, dirty work! Surely, if the House can be brought to consider the subject seriously and gravely, they cannot fail to become convinced of the unpleasant attitude in which we are placed.

The people, sir, will see it, and I will lay it before them, and ask them to say to this body that, if its proceedings continue to be of a similar character to the present, the time is not far distant when to have a seat on this floor will be but little gratification.

For the purposes thus briefly stated, Mr. Speaker, I wish to propound this question; but if any member can give me a good reason against it, I will withdraw it.

Mr. PEYTON. Oh! take a vote on it.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well; it is in the possession of the House; I will take a vote.

Mr. BOON. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. Did he vote for or against bringing Reuben M. Whitney to this House? Because the responsibility of this proceeding must rest with those who—

The CHAIR interposed, and said the gentleman from Indiana was out of order.

Mr. DAWSON. I will answer the gentleman's question, sir, if I may be permitted to do so.

The CHAIR. Both gentlemen are out of order.

The question was then lost without a division; and accordingly the House determined that the interrogatory be not propounded.

Interrogatory of Mr. HARRISON of Missouri.—Do you know of any arrangement, or understanding, made by any member of this House, that R. M. Whitney should be brought before the House, in order that the conduct of the Hon. Mr. Wise and the Hon. Mr. PEYTON, as members of the investigating committee, should be brought into the investigation, and exposed to the country; and, if so, state what that arrangement or understanding was, and who they are that concerted it?

Mr. VANDERPOEL must object to this interrogatory, inasmuch as questions of a similar character had been several times decided by the House to be improper. He had no doubt the gentleman who propounded this interrogatory, had done so for good purposes, but he would submit to the House, whether they had not better proceed with the trial of Mr. Whitney, and not run off into another question.

Mr. HARRISON, in reply, and in support of the question he had put, remarked:

Mr. SPEAKER. I know that questions having a similar bearing, have been propounded by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton.) I was aware of that when I rose to offer the question I have submitted. But those questions did not directly embrace the point which is the object of the one I have offered. I cannot, therefore, withdraw it. I am desirous that the question should be answered. In every point of view in which the subject can be brought to the mind, it is proper that it should be answered. A grave and serious charge has been made, and in my opinion it should be met. It has been soundly asserted—the charge has been broadly made, by two members of this body, that Mr. Whitney was to be brought here, not for the purpose of trying the contempt alleged against him, but for giving to the investigation which was to grow out of it, a particular direction that was to involve and expose the conduct of certain gentlemen of the investigating committee. Sir, it has been charged that a conspiracy was formed by members of this House, to carry on this trial in a way that was, in fact, to make two gentlemen of this House defendants in the case. It has been said, backed by the assertion too, that proof of it could be adduced, that a combination for this purpose has been entered into by members on this floor. Sir, this is a heavy charge, coming from members of this body; it is one that should not be disregarded. I am for inquiring into it. We owe it to those who make it; for, being members of this House, however exceptional their conduct may appear, I assert it is due to them that the inquiry should be made. I maintain that upon principles of justice, at all times applicable, and upon the rights which belong to each and every member of this body. What is their case to-day, may be ours to-morrow. If we fail to extend that justice which, as members, they have a right to look for, what may we expect, when the case becomes ours?

But, sir, the charge involves considerations of still greater moment than those I have mentioned. It involves the honor and character of this House. Are gentlemen prepared to set here, and listen tamely and quietly to such charges, coming from a portion of their own body? Is there an honorable man on this floor willing to rest under such imputations? For one, I am not. Let the inquiry be made. I do not fear the investigation; my hands are clean. If there be guilt, let the guilty suffer; and if the charges are unfounded, those that have made them will stand condemned and rebuked in the eyes of every candid man for their rash and imprudent course. Sir, we owe it to ourselves to have this matter inquired into. We owe it to the dignity of this body. What! a conspiracy entered into by gentlemen on this floor against a portion of their fellow members! A combination formed, by which the ostensible object of this trial is converted into an engine to operate on others! And all this, too, concocted in secret meetings! Is this nothing? If this be nothing, what is it that will rouse the sensibility of honorable gentlemen on this floor? As a member of the House, I engaged the inquiry made. I wish to know who, if any, have been engaged in not only thus abusing the powers of the House, but trifling with the business of the country. And if the charge be unfounded, let those that have made it suffer the punishment to which they have justly exposed themselves.

Sir, it is due to the people of this country that the inquiry should be made. They have a right to know not only those who are ready to abuse the powers of this House, and treat its authority with contempt, but especially those who, at this period of the session, when all the important business of the country is matured and ripened for action, will sport with the great interests of this nation in thus blocking up all its business for the unworthy purpose of gratifying their private feelings.

Is it possible that this body has been made, by any understanding or arrangement, the instrument of such a purpose? Sir, if there be any such understanding, I again repeat, let the inquiry be made, that the people of this country may know it, and inflict upon the guilty the sentence of their just indignation.

Sir, I am now proud that I made the motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution under which we are conducting this trial. I was induced to do it to economise time. I thought then that I foresaw the difficulties which we have already met at every step of the trial, and that we could not progress and go through with it, without probably consuming the remainder of the session. Had my motion carried, we might have ended this business in ten minutes, and avoided that shameful consumption of time, at this late hour of the session, which the trial must necessarily take. But, when my motion failed, I then entered into the trial with my mind directed to the guilt or innocence of Mr. Whitney, and with a determination of carrying it on, for the purpose of ascertaining that fact. But, sir, is it not an inexcusable perversion of the ostensible object of this trial, if there has been any arrangement or understanding among the members of this House, to give it a direction never contemplated by those who regarded it as a question involving the highest considerations? I am unwilling to believe that there are any here so totally regardless of the public interests, and of the dignity of this body, as to be guilty of such an act. But the charge has been made, and we should meet it. It is for this purpose that I have propounded this question, and I hope the House will permit it to be answered.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays, which the House refused to order, and it was decided that the interrogatory should not be put, without a division.

Interrogatory of Mr. McKEON.—Will you examine the list of the yeas and nays, taken on the question of issuing a warrant against R. M. Whitney for an alleged contempt? Will you state the number of those friendly to the administration, who voted for the arrest, and the number of those who voted against the arrest?

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected to this interrogatory. He was in hopes, that after deciding eight or nine times that interrogatories of this kind should not be propounded; that they would proceed with the trial of Mr. Whitney, and would cease to try the judges instead of trying the accused.

Mr. McKEON said that his colleague (Mr. Vanderpoel) need not have any apprehension that he (Mr. McK.) wished, in any way, to investigate motives. He wished to get at a few facts that might be useful in the inquiry now before the House. He had heard charges made that there was a conspiracy in this matter, and he wanted to know who the conspirators were who brought up this investigation. He wished the whole story to be told. He believed that the resolution, which was the foundation of this proceeding, did not proceed from an administration member. It was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Lincoln.) The arrest was not made by the mass of the administration members. He had not examined the journals of the House, but he had understood that but fourteen of the administration members voted for the resolution, and that, in the minority on that question, would be found but few opposition members. We have heard intimations thrown out that the President has been concerned in bringing about this proceeding. Well, sir, if he has been in the conspiracy, it must have been with his political opponents; and if so, it will be somewhat a matter of astonishment to the country. The motives for voting, by gentlemen on both sides, were various. Some voted against it because it would consume time; others, because we had no jurisdiction. He would impugn the motives of no person, either on one side or the other. He was anxious to get at the facts, but he would not insist on his question if, in any way, it would retard the business before them.

The question was then taken, and it was decided that the interrogatory should not be put to the witness, without a division.

First interrogatory of Mr. BOND.—Will you be good enough to examine the journal of this House, showing the vote on the motion of the member from Missouri, (Mr. Harrison,) to reconsider the vote allowing R. M. Whitney to examine witnesses, and state, if you can, how many members of this House, favorable to the present administration, voted for it, and how many against?

Mr. CUSHMAN objected to this interrogatory, on the ground that it was trifling with the House.

Mr. BOND said, the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Cushman) objected to the question, as trifling with the House. It would have been better for that gentleman to have thought of the manner in which, and by whom, this whole proceeding had been made to trifling away the time of this House. The gentleman from New York (Mr. McKee) had just offered and advocated a question by which he intended to show that the administration party were opposed to the proceeding against Reuben M. Whitney. Mr. B. said he did not doubt this; for he saw, by the direction which had been given to this case, that that party were not only disinclined to bring Whitney here, but had lost sight of the object for which he was arrested. This was a proceeding for an alleged contempt committed by Whitney, in refusing to appear and give testimony before a select committee of this House, when summoned for that purpose under the order of the House. The party being brought to the House, offered in writing his reasons for refusing to go before the committee. Mr. B. appealed to the House, to know if any member of it entertained any doubt as to the manner in which such a case would be disposed of in the courts of the country, whether of superior or inferior jurisdiction. All would agree that the first and most important step would be, either to require the accused to verify his excuse by his oath, or submit to interrogatories, with a view to purge himself of his contempt, if he could. The accused knew (and he was the only one who could know) whether he meant to commit a contempt; and if he would, under oath, say he designed none, Mr. B. did not suppose any member of the House wished to punish him. If this had been done, the case would, in all probability, have been disposed of in ten minutes. And whether the precedents in cases of contempt be regarded, or the time of the House (now more precious than ever, from the late period of the session) be of any value, the case should have been disposed of in the shortest possible time consistent with justice. Why was it not done so? Upon whom did the responsibility rest for the extraordinary direction given to this case, and the consequent consumption of time? Gentlemen say they did not vote to bring Whitney here. That, Mr. Speaker, is not the true question.

Mr. B. maintained that the accused was rightly and properly brought before the House. It had, by a solemn vote been determined, that a select committee should inquire into the condition of some of the public departments; and for that purpose might call witnesses before them. That committee reported to the House that they believed it necessary, and had summoned the accused, but he refused to appear. Mr. B. said he would not detain the House, to prove the propriety of arresting the witness, in order to inquire into the alleged contempt; it was self evident.

Whatever error had been committed, might be traced to the vote of the House on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. Harrison,) to reconsider the resolution allowing the examination of witnesses. The vote upon these resolutions had been hastily given; and it was not at first discovered that they were susceptible of the construction which has been put on them. The gentleman from Missouri before alluded to, fearing the state of things which has followed, moved the reconsideration, with a view, as he expressly urged, to follow the uniform precedents in such cases, and at the same time economise the time of the House. Mr. B. said that motion had been deliberately voted down by that same majority in this House, which possesses a resistless power; and on them should rest the responsibility of an utter disregard of all order and precedent in such cases, as well as a waste of time. The question which he propounded would show that vote, and was a fair set-off to the interrogatory of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. McKee,) which Mr. B. said he considered as evading, if not, in fact, dodging, the merits of this part of the controversy.

And as a further evidence of the fixed determination of that same majority, to disregard the established usages of all courts in cases of contempt. Mr. BOND said he would remind the House that an honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Chambers,) had, at the very instant when the accused appeared, after the adoption of the extraordinary resolution referred to, moved to put him under his oath, with a view to his immediate discharge if he disclaimed all contempt; and this proposition was voted down! It is then, Mr. Speaker, perfectly plain, that the administration party of this House have lost sight of the contempt charged against the accused, and have put it into his power not only to evade pursuit, but to waste our time.

Gentlemen may flatter themselves that they can escape all obloquy, by alleging that they did not vote to bring Whitney before the House. Mr. BOND wished to remind them of a certain fable, in which one of the actors did not take the meat and the other had it not. They were equally culpable. And though gentlemen had been unwilling to bring Whitney here, they cannot deny the public necessity of this House using such authority. He appeared; if they have, by giving his case its new and strange direction, committed a greater error than if they had voted for his arrest, and will shield him from his examination as a witness.

Mr. B. concluded by expressing a hope that he might be indulged in putting the question.

The question was then taken, and it was decided that the interrogatory should not be put to the witness, without a division.

Fifth interrogatory by COUNSEL.—Please state particularly whether Mr. Peyton's complaint of Mr. Whitney's frown or scowl, mentioned in your preceding evidence, was made before or after Mr. Whitney had left the committee room, by direction of the chairman, and in the course of Mr. Peyton's apology to the committee for his violence; and whether that be not the point of time referred to in that part of your evidence, where you say "Mr. Peyton complained of it at the time."

Answer.—In my preceding answer to an interrogatory, where I mentioned Mr. Peyton's complaint "at the time," I mean by that phrase, to include "the time" occupied with this affair in the committee room. I think the complaint was made after Mr. Whitney left the room, and whilst Mr. Peyton was apologising to the committee; but I am confident he referred to a scowl or frown which was given at the time the witness handed his answer to the chairman.

Sixth Interrogatory by COUNSEL.—Did you see such scowl or frown as you have just mentioned?

Answer.—I did, not, and have so stated in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Seventh question by COUNSEL.—Please state particularly whether, at the time Mr. Peyton first broke out in passion against Mr. Whitney, or at the time when Mr. Wise first denounced the insolence of Mr. Whitney in the terms before stated by you, there was any cause apparent in the manner or language of either of those gentlemen, for their irritation, except Mr. Whitney's written answer to Mr. Peyton's question; and whether you did, at that time, suspect, or had any reason, and what reason, to suspect either that Mr. Peyton had then received any provocation but that same written answer, or that Mr. Wise was then moved to denounce Mr. Whitney's insolence upon any other ground than the same answer?

Answer. At the time when those gentlemen first rose and manifested excitement, I knew of no cause for it, except what was to be found in the written answer of the witness; neither did I suspect, at that time, that any additional cause of provocation had been given by the manner of Mr. Whitney.

Eighth interrogatory by COUNSEL.—Did Mr. Wise, at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going around the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? If yes, what did he say was his purpose? and was the statement of Mr. Wise, as to his purpose in that movement, before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed?

Answer.—I have said, in my answer to the first interrogatory, that I heard Mr. Wise speak of this subject in a public conversation. It was in the committee room; and took place some days after the affair with Mr. Whitney. His statement was similar to that made in this House. I do not remember the exact words; but the tenor of it was—that he would have killed the witness, if the latter had attempted to draw his hand out of his breeches pocket. Mr. Wise expressed a belief, that the witness had a pistol in that hand; and that his object in drawing it out, would have been to shoot Mr. Peyton; and under such Circumstances, he, Mr. Wise, would have killed Mr. Whitney to save Mr. Peyton. I am not certain, whether Mr. Whitney's testimony was then closed; but I know that he was not present at this conversation.

Third interrogatory by Mr. WISE.—Did you understand from Mr. Wise, at any time, that he would have shot or killed Whitney, unless he (Wise) had thought it necessary to protect the life of his friend, Mr. Peyton? and did not Mr. Wise express his gratification, at every time you have heard him converse on the subject, that there was no necessity for any other interposition on his part than that which was pacific?

Answer. To the first inquiry, I answer that he did not. To the second, I answer in the affirmative.

Fourth interrogatory by Mr. WISE.—Did you hear Mr. Wise utter or make any threat whatever against the life or person of Whitney at the time of the occurrence between him and Mr. Peyton; and did Mr. Wise intimate any disposition to take any unfair advantage of Whitney?

Answer.—I heard no such threat from Mr. Wise; and saw nothing during the affair which indicated an intention on his part to assault Mr. Whitney, or to use personal violence towards him of any kind.

Fifth interrogatory by Mr. WISE. After Mr. Wise went round the table, and got near to the side of Mr. Whitney, did he (Wise) wait more than a second or two before he interposed by taking hold of his friend, Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—I cannot tell how long Mr. Wise remained at the point indicated in the question. I think it could not have been a quarter of a minute, though it may have been more or less.

Sixth interrogatory by Mr. WISE. Did not Mr. Peyton stand in such a position, with his right arm in the left side of his waistcoat, that his right arm might have been seized by Whitney's left hand, whilst his (Whitney's) right arm would have been free to use a pistol or dirk, if he had drawn one?

Mr. GHOLSON objected to this interrogatory, not so much that he had objection to its being answered, as for the purpose of establishing some rule of proceeding in this investigation. If this question was admitted, the counsel for the accused must ask similar questions, and if they should continue the examination in this way it never could be brought to a termination. He could see no possible benefit to be derived from questions of this kind, and for the bare purpose of establishing some stopping point, he objected to this interrogatory.

Mr. WISE said this was a kind of objection he had not expected to be raised by any gentleman on that floor, especially as the gentleman from Mississippi had admitted that the question was not an improper one. He wished to examine this witness, especially as to the position of the parties at the time of the difficulty in the committee room, in his own vindication for the sentiment he had uttered on that floor, and which he would then repeat in the presence of the world, that when he thought he saw his friend in danger he would interfere in his behalf. This he asked in his own vindication, that he might be permitted to examine this witness, as the answer to the question might be of importance to him.

Mr. GHOLSON then said he would withdraw the objection. He had objected to it, because of the time it might consume if they went into an examination of this kind.

Mr. WISE believed the answer to this interrogatory would prove that the parties were standing very near to each other, in the highest state of excitement. He knew his friend (Mr. Peyton) was in the highest state of excitement, and the other party was in a doubtful state; but whether he was wound up like a serpent in his coil, or whether he was confounded, Mr. W. could not tell; there was a difference of opinion as to that. Whitney was standing with his right hand in his right pantaloons pocket, and his foot advanced, and his friend was standing with his right foot advanced, and his right hand in his bosom under his vest, in which position the other party might have seized his right arm with his left hand, and riddled him with a dirk, or shot him, which Mr. W. expected at the moment would have taken place. He wished the answer to be precise as to the position of his friend at the moment of the difficulty, and whether he was not in a situation in which he might have been disarmed and shot, or dirked, by the other party.

Mr. GHOLSON then repeated that he had withdrawn his objection some time before.

Mr. HAMER then returned the following:

Answer.—I have before stated that I did not see Mr. Peyton's hand in his bosom. At the time it is said to have been there, the parties were not in reach of each other though Mr. Whitney might, by springing forward, have seized Mr. Peyton, in the manner supposed by the interrogatory.

Mr. JONES, one of the counsel for the accused, informed the House, that for the purpose of saving the time of the House, the accused proposed to discharge two of the witnesses, which he had summoned, Mr. W. B. Lewis, Esq. and John T. Sullivan, Esq. and they were accordingly discharged.

Mr. ALFORD moved that the House adjourn, lost—ayes 63, noes 78.

(Mr. HAMER, the witness under examination, was then discharged from the stand, and the testimony of the Hon. Mr. MARTIN of Alabama, was proceeded in.)

TESTIMONY OF THE HON. J. L. MARTIN.

First question by COUNSEL for the accused.—Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee whereof Mr. Garland is chairman, on Wednesday the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and Peyton as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Answer. During the evening session of the committee mentioned in this interrogatory, held on the 25th day of January last, a difficulty arose between Mr. Peyton, a member of the committee, and Mr. R. M. Whitney, who had been called before them as a witness, and who was then under examination.

To make myself clearly understood, it may be important here to give the situation of the different members of the committee, and of Mr. Whitney, at the moment of the commencement of the quarrel. Mr. Whitney being under examination, was sitting near a small table, upon which he wrote his answers, to the interrogatories propounded to him, in the corner of the committee room, on the right of the fire place; Mr. Garland, Mr. Peyton, Mr. Hamer, and Mr. Gillet were sitting at a long table which sat in front of the fire; Mr. Hamer at the end nearest to Mr. Whitney; Mr. Gillet at the opposite end; Mr. Peyton and Mr. Garland in front of the fire; Mr. Peyton nearest to Mr. Whitney, with his face turned toward Mr. Garland; Mr. Wise, Mr. Fairfield, and myself were sitting upon a sofa on the opposite side of the fire from Mr. Whitney. The examination of the witness was conducted by Mr. Peyton, who had propounded to him question No. 15, a copy of which I append hereto; to which the witness returned the answer, a copy of which I also append hereto. Mr. Pierce and Mr. Johnson were absent. When Mr. Garland, the chairman, had read aloud the answer of Mr. Whitney, Mr. Peyton addressed the Chair, and said: "I wish you to inform this witness that he is not to insult me in his answers; if he does, God damn him, I will take his life upon the spot." As he uttered the latter part of this sentence, he rose, and turned towards Mr. Whitney, and addressing him, said something like this, the precise words I do not recollect: "You have said that I am shielded by the Constitution; now, sir, I wish you to understand that I claim no such protection; and if you insult me, you damned dog, I will take your life." Mr. Wise at this moment arose, and advanced to the side of Mr. Peyton, and in front of Mr. Whitney, and said "yes, this damned insolence, or your damned insolence, is insufferable." Mr. Garland, who was endeavoring to keep order, spoke to Mr. Wise, but what he said, is not recollect, it was heard. Mr. Wise made no other remark, but stepped a few feet back, toward the opposite side of the room from that at which Mr. Whitney was, and stood. Mr. Peyton turned from Mr. Whitney, and remarked:—"hitherto I have treated him with marked respect; damn him, I have treated him as if he had been a gentleman; and to be thus insulted by a damned thief and robber, damn him he shan't do it." While uttering the latter part of this sentence, he discovered more excitement, and turned toward Mr. Whitney, (but if he said any thing, I do not recollect what it was,) who rose and addressing himself to the Chair, claimed the protection of the committee; when Mr. Peyton said to him, "God damn you, hush, or be silent, you shan't speak; all your communications are to be made in writing. You shan't say a word, while in this room; if you do I'll put you to death;" advancing toward him, and putting his hand into his bosom, and also ordered him to take his seat.

Mr. Garland, at this moment, stepped between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney, remonstrating with the former. Mr. Wise, who had remained silent and stationary, looking at the parties, suddenly turned, and walked briskly around the table at the end opposite to the one at which the parties were, (pausing a few seconds,) opposite to the left side of Mr. Whitney, and some few feet from him; and then advanced in front of Mr. Peyton, and between him and Mr. Whitney, and putting his hand upon his breast, remarked: "don't Peyton, damn him, he is not worth your notice; or the damned scoundrel is not worth your notice," followed by some other remarks which I do not recollect, but which I thought at the time, was intended to induce Mr. Peyton to desist. While Mr. Wise was passing around the table, I advanced to the side of Mr. Peyton, and placed my hand upon his right arm, and at the same time remonstrated against any violence, and endeavored to calm his feelings.

Mr. Peyton then sat down, but soon turned toward Mr. Whitney, and said, "damn him, his eyes are on me; God damn him he is looking at me; he shan't do it; damn him, he shan't look at me." At this time I moved to the examination of Mr. Whitney should be suspended; when Mr. Hamer rose and objected, and said that the witness must understand that he was not to treat any member of the committee with disrespect. Mr. Garland, I think, remarked that the witness might retire to another room, which he did. Mr. Hamer then offered the resolution which has been published, a copy of which I append hereto, which was adopted by the committee without objection. At this time a proposition was made that the committee rise, which was objected to by Mr. Wise, to the members of the committee, apart from Mr. Peyton, who gave as his reasons that he wished to retain Mr. Peyton there in committee until he should become cool; that he apprehended danger if, in the state of feelings which he (Mr. P.) then was, the committee should rise. Mr. Whitney was recalled, and one or two questions propounded to him. I should have mentioned that when Mr. Whitney returned, and was informed of the resolution which the committee had adopted, he remarked, "that if he had done any thing which the committee considered disrespectful, he regretted it and apologized."

I think it proper that I should state here that Mr. Whitney, in returning his answer to the interrogatory to the chairman of the committee, had, from their situation, necessarily to pass it by Mr. Peyton; that, in doing so, he threw his eyes upon him with a scowl upon his countenance, which I thought at the time was intended to indicate that his feelings were excited. My attention was drawn to Mr. Whitney at this time, the more particularly, from the fact, that I knew the answer to this interrogatory involved the truth of the remarks made by Mr. Peyton in the House, and contradicted in the card of Mr. Whitney, both of which I had read in the newspapers. I heard no remark made by Mr. Whitney when the answer was handed in. I thought Mr. Whitney's countenance indicated some excitement when he first read the interrogatory, and while he was writing his answer. I heard no expression from him, however, by word.

This is my best recollection of the unpleasant transaction. I have doubtless omitted many circumstances of minor importance that happened, for I do not profess to be able to give them all. I have given all, however, that I have a recollection of at this moment.

[The following is the question and answer referred to in the above:]

Question fifteenth.—Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he, in any manner, countenance you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?

Answer.—I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with "or did he," &c.; therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof.

The witness was desired to withdraw.

Mr. HAMER moved that the foregoing answer to the fifteenth question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee.

The witness being called in, the chairman informed him of the decision of the committee, and returned him his answer. The witness assured the chairman that, if he had been in any manner disrespectful to the committee, he very much regretted it, and apologized for it.

Second question by COUNSEL.—What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indecorum or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer.—I do not feel prepared to say, that, at all times during the examination of Mr. Whitney before the committee, his demeanor was entirely unexceptionable.

On the 13th of January last, while the committee had under consideration the application of Mr. Whitney, who had appeared before them as a witness, for further time to prepare for his examination, several questions were propounded to him, the object of which was to enable the committee to decide upon his application. His reply to one of which I thought disrespectful to the committee, in which opinion, at the time, from the expressions of the members present, I thought they unanimously concurred. Instead of responding to the interrogatory, Mr. Whitney replied that he declined to answer any further interrogatories, (until his application for further time was acted upon by the committee, and this was done, too, after he had been informed expressly of the object of the interrogatories.) For a full understanding of this occurrence, I refer to the printed journal of the committee of that day, beginning at page 23, and herewith sent.

This course of Mr. Whitney was excepted to in the committee. No decision, however, was made, and consequently no notice taken of the exception upon the journal of that day. The necessity of his answer was, by the subsequent determination of the committee, granting the time asked, obliterated. And when afterwards the subject of reporting this conduct to the House was brought to the notice of the committee, it was decided to be unnecessary. I recollect of no other conduct of Mr. Whitney to which the attention of the committee was called, except his reply to the interrogatory out of which the difficulty mentioned in my answer to the first interrogatory grew.

Third question by COUNSEL.—Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unhappy scene in question, was or was not cool, collected, and forbearing; whether he did, or did not, manifest by word, deed, or gesture, or by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. Peyton. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner, as may go to show whether he meditated assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Answer.—I do not remember to have seen any act upon the part of Mr. Whitney, except his reply to the interrogatory, and the scowl of countenance mentioned in my answer to the first interrogatory, which I thought indicated any disposition to produce a difficulty upon the occasion alluded to. I saw no effort upon his part to do any act of violence; my view of him, however, during part of the time, was intercepted by individuals, in standing and passing between us, so that I cannot say he done no act of the sort.

First question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did or did not Mr. Wise, endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney, by stepping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. Peyton, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer.—Mr. Wise did interpose, and I thought his interposition very efficient in preventing violence upon the occasion alluded to in this interrogatory; and, with the exception of the part which he first took upon the excitement of the moment, and which I have described in my answer to the first interrogatory, and except, too, the act of taking his station on the left of Mr. Whitney, he acted the part of a peace maker. In taking his station on the left of Mr. Whitney, I thought, at the moment, was intended for the security of Mr. Peyton, whom, from the sudden manner of Mr. Wise's movement in doing so, he considered in danger. This was the impression upon my mind at the moment. I did not, myself, apprehend any such danger. I had seen nothing to indicate it, but, as I have remarked, I was not in a situation to see every act that was done, or might have been done, by Mr. Whitney; for, at the instant when Mr. Wise started round the table, Mr. Peyton and Mr. Wise, and probably some other person, were between Mr. Whitney and myself.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise privately request the members of the committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed, to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. Peyton being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? and did not Mr. Wise, at the time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer.—I answer in the affirmative throughout, and refer to my answer to the first interrogatory propounded for a full response to this.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did Mr. Wise do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. Peyton, did he do more than say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer.—For answer to this interrogatory, I refer to my answer to the first interrogatory.

Fourth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did or did not Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. Peyton had occurred; and did not his examination occupy much time, and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. Peyton after the difficulty occurred?

Answer.—I thought the course of Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton, both before and after the difficulty mentioned, entirely respectful. Mr. Whitney's examination occupied some time after the difficulty, but how long precisely I do not remember. The question to the answer to which exception was taken, and out of which this unfortunate occurrence grew, was No. 15; and questions to the number of 53 or more were propounded to the witness in his whole examination.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Had you, or had you not seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 6th of January last, which is as follows:

[This card has been heretofore published in the Globe.]

And do you not know or believe that Mr. Peyton had seen said card, or was informed of its contents? and did not the answer to the question which preceded the difficulty, involve the truth of the charges which the card of Mr. Whitney pronounced to be false, and for the uttering of which he pronounced Mr. Peyton a calumniator?

Answer.—This interrogatory I answer in the affirmative throughout.

First question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—I do not understand what is meant by the "interposition of Mr. Peyton," in reference to this transaction. I have stated, in my answer to the first interrogatory, all of the language used by Mr. Whitney, that I now remember, and the circumstances under which the same was expressed.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did Mr. R. M. Whitney use immediately after the witness says, "Mr. Peyton rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer.—I do not recollect that any language was used by Mr. Whitney at the time mentioned. Indeed, I recollect of no other language used by Mr. Whitney during the difficulty, than what I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remarks made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—For a full answer to this interrogatory, I refer to my answer to the first interrogatory propounded to me, in which I have spoken as particularly on this point as I recollect the occurrence.

Second question of Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, cutting him off from R. M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with his left foot advanced?

Answer.—My impression is that he did. My situation, however, was such that I could not correctly determine as to the fact. I was at the time sitting on the sofa, in the rear of Mr. Peyton. I did not see Mr. Whitney at the moment when Mr. Peyton put his hand in his bosom. Mr. Peyton himself, and others, intercepted my view of Mr. Whitney.

Third question of Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—I did, and refer to my answer to the first interrogatory for my answer to this.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—He did, during some part of his remarks; but at what point of time I do not recollect.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL.—If it had been Mr. Peyton's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer.—I think he had.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after, the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to?

Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he re-appeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—For answer to the first branch of this interrogatory, I refer to my answer to the 6th interrogatory propounded to me by Mr. Calhoun. I did not apprehend danger to Mr. Whitney from any quarter, upon his return to the committee room. The treatment of Mr. Whitney, by Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton, both before and after this difference, was respectful so far as I observed.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL.—Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel? and was it not remarked by Mr. Peyton, that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer.—There is such a rule as referred to in this interrogatory; and for my reply to the balance of the question, I refer to my answer to the first interrogatory.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not, said witness refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one above alluded to, characterising them as inquisitorial, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—He had refused to answer several questions, chart actuating them as inquisitorial, which were permitted to be put by the committee. The question of compelling an answer was reserved for the future consideration of the committee, as I understood, if the witness should object to answering it.

First question by COMMITTEE.—Was, or was not, the deportment of Mr. Peyton that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remark and conduct?

Answer.—I am unable to say what the intention of Mr. Peyton was upon the occasion alluded to in this interrogatory. I have described, as fully as I am able to do, the acts of Mr. Peyton in my answer to the first interrogatory propounded to me.

Second question by COMMITTEE.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney, and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory, and what was the vote of the committee also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory, and will you now set this forth to be received in connection with, and as part of your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer.—I have appended to my answer, to the first interrogatory, a copy, which I believe to be correct, of the question and answer referred to; and, also, a copy from the journal of the committee of the motion made and adopted by the committee; and here state that there was no objection made in committee to its adoption.

There being no further questions to be propounded to this witness, the Hon. RANSOM H. GILLET of New York was called on the stand.

MR. GILLET'S TESTIMONY.

First question by the Counsel for the accused.—Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee, whereof Mr. GARLAND is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January; and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. WISE and PEYTON, as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Answer.—I have heard the answer of Mr. Fairfield to this interrogatory, and recollect the facts stated by him, and think they are truly stated, and I adopt his answer thereto, as a part of my own. I think other words reflecting upon Mr. Whitney were used by both Mr. WISE and PEYTON, but I cannot call to mind any that I am certain were spoken, before Mr. Whitney retired from the committee room.

[The remaining portion of the witness's reply was similar to that of Mr. Fairfield to the same query, heretofore published in the proceedings.]

Second question by COUNSEL.—What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indecorum or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer.—I never saw any indecorum or disrespect on the part of Mr. Whitney towards the committee, or any member thereof, unless his written answer is deemed disrespectful. I never heard of any complaint by any member of the committee, of his treating the committee, or any of its members, with indecorum or disrespect. I am not aware of his being censured by the committee, unless the returning of the answer referred to is construed to be censuring him.

Third question by COUNSEL.—Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unquiet scene in question, was or was not cool, collected and forbearing; whether he did, or did not, manifest by word, deed, or gesture, or by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. PEYTON. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner, as may go to show whether he manifested assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Answer.—The conduct of Mr. Whitney was, as far as I observed it, cool, collected, and forbearing. I neither saw nor heard anything on his part, by word, deed, or gesture, manifesting a disposition to assault Mr. PEYTON.

First question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not Mr. WISE, endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. PEYTON, and R. M. Whitney, by stepping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. PEYTON, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer.—Mr. WISE did endeavor to pacify Mr. PEYTON, and stepped between him and Mr. Whitney, as I have heretofore intimated, and I think put his hand on him while doing so. I did not observe that he pushed him back from his position.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. WISE privately request the members of the Committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. PEYTON being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? and did not Mr. WISE, at the time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer.—I have some indistinct recollection of some person making the suggestion alluded to, but I cannot state by whom it was made, nor its exact purport.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did Mr. WISE do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. PEYTON, did he do more than say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer.—As to what Mr. WISE did or said, I refer to my answer to the first interrogatory.

Fourth question of Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not Mr. WISE and Mr. PEYTON treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. PEYTON had occurred; and did not his examination occupy much time; and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. PEYTON after the difficulty occurred?

Answer.—I am unaware of Mr. PEYTON, or Mr. WISE, treating Mr. Whitney with disrespect while he was before the committee, before or after the difficulty. His examination occupied considerable time, much of which was occupied in writing out and settling questions to be put to him. Most of the questions were put after the difficulty.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Had you, or had you not seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January last, which is as follows:
[Heretofore published in the Globe.]

Answer.—I saw Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January. I do not know that Mr. PEYTON had seen it. For answer to the latter part of this interrogatory, I refer to the card quoted in it, and to the question and answer referred to, which speak for themselves.

First question of Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. PEYTON?

Answer.—I am not aware that Mr. Whitney used any language immediately before the difficulty.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did Mr. R. M. Whitney use immediately after the witness says, "Mr. PEYTON rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer.—I do not know of any language used by Mr. Whitney, after preparing his answer, but what I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory, wherein he claimed the protection of the committee while before it.

First question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. PEYTON was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remarks made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—I think he did not.

Second question of Mr. BELL.—When Mr. PEYTON rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, cutting him off from R. M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. PEYTON put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with the left foot advanced?

Answer.—I think he did. At the time Mr. PEYTON put his hand to his bosom, I think I could have seen Mr. Whitney, but I have no recollection of having seen his hand thrust into his pocket, or that his left foot was advanced.

Third question of Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. PEYTON, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—I did, but noticed none.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. PEYTON complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—I did not hear Mr. PEYTON, at the time, complain that Mr. Whitney had insulted him by his look.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL.—If it had been Mr. PEYTON's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer.—If the weapon was easily drawn, I should think he had.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. PEYTON to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after, the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he reappeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. WISE or Mr. PEYTON? State whether they, and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—I think Mr. PEYTON proposed fifty-three or more questions in his examination after his protest, and the difficulty occurred on the answer to the 15th. Both before and after the difficulty, while before the committee, both Mr. PEYTON and Mr. WISE, treated Mr. Whitney respectfully. After Mr. Whitney returned before the committee, I thought the excited feelings of Mr. PEYTON and Mr. WISE were so much allayed that I did not apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to him.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL.—Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel and was it not remarked by Mr. PEYTON that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer.—There was such a rule as is referred to. The only remark of the kind made by Mr. PEYTON, is given in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not said witness refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. PEYTON, before the one above alluded to, characterising them as inept, which questions had been decided by the committee as per se to be propounded?

Answer.—Before the difficulty, I believe Mr. Whitney had refused to answer some six or eight of the interrogatories, and a portion of them, he alleged, were of an inept character, and therefore declined to answer them. Previously to the difficulty seven questions had been proposed that evening, three of which he answered, three he declined to answer, and to the last one he gave the response which immediately preceded the difficulty. No questions were propounded except by the consent of the committee.

First question by COMMITTEE.—Was, or was not, the deportment of Mr. PEYTON, that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remark and conduct?

Answer.—I cannot state any fact not already given, going to show what Mr. PEYTON desired to accomplish by his acts and words.

Second question by COMMITTEE.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory, and what was the vote of the committee also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory, and will you now set them forth to be received in connection with, and as part of, your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer.—The question put, was as follows: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Taney, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, or countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department."

Answer.—I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with "or did he" &c. heretofore being the party accused. I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation, should be called upon to produce his proof.

"The witness was desired to withdraw."

Mr. HAMER moved that the foregoing answer to the 15th question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee.

There being no further questions to be propounded to Mr. GILLET, and all the witnesses summoned having been examined.

Mr. GHOLSON then moved that a subpoena be issued for the Hon. JAMES GARLAND, that he might be furnished with the same interrogatories which had been furnished to the other witnesses.

Mr. GARLAND replied, that it would be unnecessary to issue a subpoena, as he would be in attendance upon the House the whole time of its sessions.

Mr. GARLAND was then sworn, and furnished with interrogatories, so that he might have his answers prepared by the next day.

Mr. WISE would make an additional suggestion. As he understood the counsel for the accused had no other witnesses to be called and sworn, he would inquire if the committee for the House had any, and if they had, he would suggest that they might be called and sworn, and these same interrogatories given to them, so that they might have their answers prepared.

Mr. GHOLSON said the committee had just called the only witness they proposed to examine.

Mr. THOMAS observed that the counsel for the accused were about making an application for other witnesses to be summoned.

Mr. WISE wished to inquire if, when the accused had done calling his witnesses, and when the witnesses which had been called by the committee on the part of the House were examined, his friend from Tennessee (Mr. PEYTON) and himself would be permitted to call witnesses in their defence.

Mr. THOMAS said he might have misconstrued the duties of the committee, but he would state what he considered their duties to be. He looked upon the committee in the light of a prosecuting attorney on the part of the House; and after the counsel for the accused should have closed their testimony, it would be the duty of the committee to produce to the House oral or written evidence in support of the charge made against the accused; and the committee would take it as a favor if the two honorable gentlemen (Mr. PEYTON and Mr. WISE) would aid them by furnishing the committee with the names of such witnesses as they might desire to have summoned, or bring to their notice such written testimony as might have a bearing upon the case.

Mr. WISE wished to say, with perfect respect to the committee of the House, and he wished to be distinctly understood when he said with perfect respect to the committee, that he had had no part or lot in the prosecution of this accused; and he would state to the House, that he never would be caught in being a prosecutor in any case unless called upon by the laws of the land to do so. He should neither assist, aid, abet, or counsel in this prosecution; and he only asked, not that he might be permitted to call witnesses there to testify against any man, but that he might be permitted to call witnesses to testify to the truth touching his own conduct. He only desired to call witnesses as a defence of himself. He would despise the calling witnesses as a prosecutor; he would scorn it. He had not voted either in the committee or in the House in the case of this man, nor would he testify in the case. All he would ask of gentlemen, would be to allow him the poor privilege of examining witnesses in his own defence; and he was willing to stand or fall by the testimony which would be given, as he knew that he could be convicted of nothing, excepting it was that he had sworn some oaths, and in extension of that he had only to say that he was following the example of those who were in the highest situations; he was but making use of court language; and if any gentleman wished to hear a specimen of this kind of language, all he had to do was to go to the White House and speak of the Florida campaign. He repeated that he wished to call witnesses to justify himself, not to prosecute any man.

Mr. THOMAS expressed a wish to say a very few words.

The CHAIR said the whole of this conversation was out of order.

Mr. THOMAS had but a word or two to say. Whether the gentleman from Virginia, or the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other member of that House, might wish to adduce testimony in vindication of those two gentlemen, as implicated in this investigation, or with whatever other motive they might think proper to furnish the committee with written testimony or oral testimony, it was the duty of the committee to bring that evidence in for the consideration of counsel. The House had felt itself too numerous and too unwieldy to make its arguments in the form of an issue between any parties, and thought proper that the duty should devolve on a smaller number. He again repeated that without inquiry into the motives with which the gentlemen bring testimony forward, Mr. T. as a member of the committee, would be glad himself to concur.

The CHAIR must interpose again. There was no proposition before the House. Is the counsel for the accused prepared to proceed further?

Mr. LINCOLN said it was proper for himself that neither he nor any other member of the select committee should have any thing further to do with this prosecution. He should have availed himself, he said, of an earlier opportunity of asking to be excused from attending on the committee of examination, but that he had been almost continually occupied on the select committee. He had, however, taken no part in the management of this examination, and had not voted that day on any one question brought before the House, in relation to the subject. Under these circumstances, he asked the House to excuse him from serving on the former committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is not worth while to discharge him now, as his duties must be nearly at an end.

Mr. L. was, however, excused by the House.

Mr. WHITNEY was then conducted from the bar, and, on motion of Mr. BOND,

The House adjourned.

R. M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

SATURDAY, FEB. 18, 1837.

TESTIMONY OF THE HON. J. L. MARTIN OF ALA.

Fifteenth question by Mr. BELL.—Have you, or any other person to your knowledge, had any conversation with the said R. M. Whitney since the occurrence in the committee? If so, did he inform you that he was alarmed, and that his fears had induced him to take the course which he has done in this matter? State all he said in relation to his fears, or the motives which induced his course upon this occasion.

Answer.—I have had no conversation whatever with Mr. Whitney since the time alluded to in this interrogatory, that I now remember of, and certainly none upon the subject mentioned.

Sixth question by Mr. PEYTON.—When did you first see the written statement of Mr. Fairfield, which he presented to this House in answer to the first interrogatory propounded to him, or the substance of the same.

Answer.—I do not recollect the day on which I first saw the statement alluded to; it was, I think, shortly after Mr. WISE and Mr. PEYTON made their statement of the occurrence of the 25th of January, before the select committee mentioned in this examination, to the House, at which time I understood that they called upon the members of the committee to make their statement of the occurrence. I was not present at the time.

Seventh question of the COUNSEL for the accused.—Did Mr. WISE, at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going around the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? If yes, what did he say was his purpose? and was the statement of Mr. WISE, as to his purpose in that movement, before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed.

Answer.—I heard Mr. WISE speaking of this subject in the committee room; but, as to the day, I am unable to specify; nor am I able to say whether it was before or after the examination of Mr. Whitney was closed. I understood Mr. WISE to state, that his object in going round the table, near to Mr. Whitney, was to be able, if Mr. Whitney attempted to use a weapon upon Mr. PEYTON, to protect him from injury. I understood him to say, that if it had been rendered necessary for Mr. Peyton's safety, he would have taken Mr. Whitney's life. He also stated that Mr. Whitney had his hand in his pocket, for the purpose, as he supposed, of drawing a weapon, seeing which, induced him to pass round the table, as above stated.

Sixteenth question by Mr. BELL.—Had you not formed, and expressed, the opinion that Mr. Whitney's conduct had, prior to the night of this occurrence, been contemptuous, and such as to show a disposition to trifle with the committee; had you not been inclined to vote to report him to the House for contempt? Did you not think and say, that he had reiterated the word "inquisitorial" offensively, and had unnecessarily wrung every change upon it, as if it was a new word to him, of which he seemed fond; and did you not concur with Mr. Wise that night, in the expression that his insolence to the committee was no longer sufferable?

Answer.—I did not consider Mr. Whitney's course respectful to the committee at all times prior to the occurrence alluded to, and particularly during the pendency of his application for further time to prepare for his examination, and to make his return to the call made upon him by the subpana duces tecum; and as a full answer to this part of this interrogatory, I refer to my answer to question number two, propounded to me.

I did express the opinion that I thought he made too free a use of the word "inquisitorial" in his answers to the interrogatories of the committee. I thought the word unnecessary in his answers; that his simple statement that he declined to answer the interrogatory, which I believe followed the word "inquisitorial" in every answer, was sufficient; and that if he desired to give his reasons for declining to answer, a less offensive word might have been used, and his meaning be as well understood. I did think his conduct, upon the night alluded to, was very objectionable, and so expressed myself.

Question by Mr. ALFORD.—Do you know, or have you any reason to believe, that Reuben M. Whitney premeditated an insult to the committee, or any member thereof, whenever he should be called before them; and do you know, or have you any reason to believe, that he armed himself in anticipation of that event?

Answer.—I do not know any thing upon the subject of this inquiry.

Question by the COUNSEL.—When you speak of Mr. Whitney's disrespectful conduct, in your answer to a preceding interrogatory, do you refer to matters appearing on the journal, or to any other indications of disrespect in manner or language, except what is there to be found? If to any other, please specify them. If to matters appearing on the journal, please refer to the pages of the printed journal now in evidence, for the passages evincing such disrespect or improprieties.

Answer.—In my answer to the second interrogatory propounded to me, I have pointed out the page of the journal upon which, and the one following, the objectionable part of his conduct is shown, and in that answer particularly referred to; they are pages 23 and 24. To this I mainly refer as the ground of exception, as stated in each of my answers to the interrogatories upon this subject, except as to my answer to the interrogatory propounded this morning, in which I refer to his use of the term "inquisitorial," and his reply to the interrogatory out of which the difficulty spoken of in this inquiry grew. I heard nothing from Mr. Whitney by word to which I took exception. I thought his deportment at times somewhat objectionable, and particularly upon the occasion of returning his answer to the fifteenth interrogatory, as mentioned in my answer to the last interrogatory.

I refer to the statement of the journal of the committee, at page 23, eight lines from the bottom, and thence the balance of the page; and from the top of page 24, down to the paragraph beginning with the words, "A letter from John P. Van Ness," also, to page 64, from the top to the notice of the adjournment of the committee. I also refer to the answers of Mr. Whitney, in his examination before the select committee, in which the term "inquisitorial" is used. [See pages of the journal 81, 82, and 83.]

[The journal being already in print, the reporters scarcely deem it necessary to print these extracts over again.]

Mr. MARTIN was then discharged from the stand.

Mr. PEYTON rose, he said to submit a proposition to the House, which he trusted would be assented to.

The CHAIR remarked that there was another witness, who had been summoned, yet to be examined; after which the gentleman's proposition might be in order.

Mr. PEYTON said he had to retire to the performance of the duties of the select committee, of which he was a member, and he wished first to submit his motion, because it was to facilitate the labors of that committee, and enable them to make their report. He then sent to the Chair the question, and the resolution he proposed to submit, to be read for the information of the House, giving notice that if any objection were made, he should move a suspension of the rules.

The resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be directed to answer, upon oath, before the House, or before the select committee, of which the honorable James Garland is chairman, the following interrogatory:

Interrogatory.—Was or was not Amos Kendall, Postmaster General, the author of the letter referred to in the following communications, made by yourself to the President of the Bank at Burlington, Vermont, which is as follows:

"With this I forward you the copy of a letter written by a person residing here, high in the confidence of the Executive, to some friends in New York and Boston. This will explain to you more fully the object of the agency, and the duties which will appertain to it.

"I communicate this with the request that it may be considered as especially communicated to you individually, but to be read to the board, and to be treated in the same manner as all things should be connected with the transactions of the board of directors of a bank."

The letter, which was anonymous, is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, November 8, 1834.
"DEAR SIR: You will recollect that there is a provision in the contracts between the Treasury Department and the deposite banks, by which they undertake to pay each their due proportion of the compensation of such agent to superintend their operations, as might be appointed by the Secretary, and that R. M. Whitney, Esq. obtained the recommendation of the deposite banks in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, for that agency.

"The near approach of the session of Congress at that time was thought to render it inexpedient to make an appointment under such circumstances, although every one acquainted with the matter acknowledges its importance.

"This posture of affairs makes it desirable that the banks themselves should take steps to secure all the benefits to themselves, and as far as practicable to the public, which were anticipated from that arrangement. It may be done by each bank appointing its own agent, but all of them the same person, to reside at the seat of Government, and travel when necessary to interchange information, make suggestions, and produce concert in relation to the currency and domestic exchanges, as well as the fiscal operations of the Government. I am persuaded that the State banks, whether depositories for the public funds or not, would derive great benefits from such an organ of intercommunication.

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury, I know, view the subject in the same light that I do, and will be gratified if the banks will establish such an agency; and from his talents, experience, and fidelity, no appointment would be more acceptable to them than that of Mr. Whitney, who has already been recommended to the department.

"My object in addressing you is to solicit your aid, particularly with the deposite banks in Boston, in first effecting the general object of establishing an agency, which is of primary importance, and then in selecting Mr. Whitney as their agent. I know of no man in the United States who has the capacity and disposition to serve them more effectually."

If said Kendall is not the author of said letter, who is?

The CHAIR said it was not in order to offer this proposition while a witness was under examination.

Mr. PEYTON merely wished that the witness, Whitney, might answer the interrogatory at the bar of the House or in the committee room.

The CHAIR repeated his decision, that the proposition could not be entertained at that stage of the proceedings.

Mr. PEYTON accordingly moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of propounding the inquiry as to who was the author of that anonymous letter, and on the motion he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. WISE remarked that perhaps the idea had not struck his friend from Tennessee that this individual was then under arrest, and whilst he was in custody of the Sergeant-at-arms of the House he could not be brought before a committee as a witness.

Mr. PEYTON replied that upon examining the rules of the House, he found that the House itself had the power to direct the examination.

The question was then taken and decided in the negative, yeas 63, nays 97—as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alford, Chilton, Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bunch, John Calhoun, Carter, John Chambers, Chetwood, Nath. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Clark, Dawson, Deberry, Evans, Forester, Granger, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harper, Hazeltine, Heister, Herod, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, James, Jennifer, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lewis, Love, Lyon, Sampson, Mason, Matur, McKenna, Milligan, Pearson, Pettigrew, Phillips, Pickens, Rencher, Russell, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taltierro, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise, and Young—63.

NAYS.—Messrs. MR. GILLET'S CROSS EXAMINATION.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee, for the first remark made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—I think he did not.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enables you to see the offensive look, or scowl of the witness R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman.

Answer.—I did, but did not observe any such scowl or look.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—I heard no such complaint at that time; I do not remember ever to have heard him complain of it in the committee room.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Have you, or any other persons to your knowledge, had any conversation with the said R. M. Whitney since the occurrence in the committee? If so, did he inform you then that he was alarmed, and that his fears had induced him to take the course which he has done in this matter? State all he said in relation to his fears, or the motives which induced his course upon this occasion.

Answer.—I do not know what conversation "other persons" may have had with Mr. Whitney, since the occurrence. I have avoided conversation with him relative to the occurrence in the committee room. He has never informed me whether he was alarmed or not, or that his fears had induced him to take his course on this subject. I know nothing of his motives, or fears, which induce his course on this occasion. I have never heard him talk of his motives on this subject. I know nothing concerning them. I do not recollect to have heard of Mr. Whitney's refusal to appear before the committee, until I heard Mr. Wise report the fact to the House. I do not remember to have heard any more concerning it, until I heard the House had ordered him to be brought before it, and had settled, as I suppose, its course of proceeding. I have an indistinct recollection of having heard him say he was not armed at the time, but when this was, or to whom addressed, I cannot state.

Question by Mr. BELL. Had, or had not, said witness (R. M. Whitney) refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one alluded to, characterizing them as inquisitorial; which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—I think I answered this interrogatory fully in one of my previous answers, the number of which I do not recollect. I refer to that answer as being a full one to this question.

Question by Mr. PEYTON.—When did you first see the written statement of Mr. Fairfield, which he presented to this House in answer to the first interrogatory propounded to him, or the substance of the same?

Answer.—I think some ten or twelve days since.

Question by the COUNSEL for the accused.—Did Mr. Wise, at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going round the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? If yes, what did he say was his purpose? And was the statement of Mr. Wise as to his purpose in that movement, before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed?

Answer.—After Mr. Whitney's testimony was closed, and I think the day that his statement of the occurrence in the committee room appeared in the Globe, I heard Mr. Wise telling in the committee room what his object was in going round the table, as mentioned in my first answer. The conversation was not addressed to me. I was writing at the time, and did not pay attention to what he was saying, until he went to the place where he had stood, and I think showed the position he had occupied. I presume I heard but a part of what he had said. I remember this: "If he had moved his right arm, or elbow, (I am not certain which) I would have shot him on the spot, as I would a black snake." These are the words that I heard, as nearly as I can remember. The residue of what he said I learned from a conversation with others, and therefore do not repeat it. I have an impression that I heard Mr. Wise on another occasion talking on this subject, but of this I am not certain.

The counsel for the accused then called to the stand WILLIAM ELWYN MOORE, one of the reporters for the Globe, who appeared and affirmed.

Testimony of Mr. MOORE, Reporter for the Globe.

Question by the Counsel.—Were you present when Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton, on Saturday, 4th February, made their statements in this House, of the occurrences in the select committee, now in question? Did you take notes at the time of what Mr. Wise said on the occasion? Was, or was not, the report of what Mr. Wise said on the occasion, appearing in the Globe newspaper of the 7th instant, now shown you taken from your notes? Please say whether such printed report be a correct or incorrect report of what he said on the occasion referred to? In particular refer to a paragraph marked in that report, beginning with the words "During this time Whitney stood, &c. and ending with the words 'wretch, on that occasion,'" and say whether these words were or were not uttered by Mr. Wise.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to this interrogatory. It seem to him to have nothing to do with the subject before the House, and on that ground he objected to it.

Mr. WISE asked of his colleague to allow the question to be put.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he could not withdraw his objections.

Mr. JONES, counsel for the accused, made a few remarks to show the necessity for putting the interrogatory, which could not be distinctly heard by the Reporter.

The question was then put, and the interrogatory ordered to be propounded—yeas 101, nays not counted.

Mr. MOORE then returned the following answer.

Answer.—I was present on the occasion referred to, but I have never seen the printed report in the Globe, till it was now shown to me, nor could I without reference to my notes, undertake to affirm whether that printed report corresponds with them or not. The report was taken from my notes, and on reading my transcript, I believed at the time that the manuscript copy was correct.

The paragraph beginning with "during this time," &c. to the words "wretch on that occasion," I could not affirm to be correct, without making a reference to my notes, but the word "between" is so obviously an error, that if I had read the paragraph in the paper, I should at once have corrected it. I say it is so obviously an error, because it is inconsistent with my general recollection of the Hon. Mr. Wise's statement, and at variance, if I recollect the report, with other parts of it. It may be an error of the press, or of the pen, for the word "with." My notes, if I had them, would show.

Second question by COUNSEL.—Where are your notes—please produce them? Where is your manuscript from your notes, from which the report in the Globe was printed. Please produce it.

Answer.—I invariably burn my notes, page after page, as I write them out, when in my own room; when I write out in the House, they are thrown on the floor, with the waste paper. I have no knowledge of the transcript—nor do I know what is done with the waste paper of the printing office. It is out of my power to produce either.

Third question by COUNSEL.—Do you perceive any other error in the said paragraph except the word "between," and what word, according to the best of your recollection, should be in the place of that word?

Answer.—I could not answer, at this distance of time, for the fidelity of any one paragraph; probably I wrote, if it be an error of the press, or intended to write, if it be a slip of the pen, the word "with." But I again respectfully refer to my first answer, and could not affirm, from memory, to the correctness of a report, after I had considered it finally disposed of by publication, and the absence of complaint for its inaccuracy. The word "between" I know to be an error.

Fourth question by COUNSEL.—Does the general tenor of the remarks, both of Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton, as given in said report, correspond, or not, with the best of your recollection of what they said; and can you, upon looking over the same, discover any material variance, from your recollection of the original remarks of those gentlemen, or from your notes of the same?

Mr. WISE said he would beg leave to state to the learned Counsel that if they desired to know what report he sanctioned he would refer them to the report of his statement in the National Intelligencer. That statement, as it there appeared, he had himself written out, from notes furnished him by one of the reporters for the Intelligencer, and from his own recollection of his statement, and there they would find his remarks as he made them, or as he intended to make them.

Mr. JONES, counsel for the accused, remarked that he was bound in candor to say to the honorable gentleman that there was a particular part of the report of his statement in the Interlignence which did not correspond with the report in the Globe. The difference between the two reports was as to the qualification, in the words "if he (Whitney) had drawn a weapon on his friend it would never have done its execution," &c.

Mr. WISE hoped the House would indulge him in the very few remarks he had to make in explanation of his statement. He understood the learned Counsel to say that they were led to doubt whether the words they had read from the Intelligencer were actually uttered by him (Mr. W.). Now he would beg leave to state to the House the reasons why these words "Let me not be misunderstood," &c. were used. He had made the general statement first, that he had walked round the end of the table, where he could see the elbow of Whitney's right arm. He (Whitney) was then standing with his left foot advanced, his right hand in his pantaloons pocket, and his eyes fixed upon Mr. Peyton. Mr. W. could see the elbow of that right arm, and he said if it had moved an inch he should have died upon the spot. Well, the moment he uttered that remark, he heard a whisper to his right—and they could hear whispers sometimes in that hall—"that is enough!" and he understood this exclamation, and knew that some gentleman was watching to catch him in some unguarded expression. Then he immediately said, distinctly, "Let me not be misunderstood," &c. and went on to state that he would only have drawn a weapon when he saw the life of his friend endangered; and that Whitney's weapon should never have done its execution, if he had drawn one. He had taken the notes of the reporter for the Intelligencer, and with those notes and his own recollection of the statement he had made on the floor of the House, he had made out the report as it appeared in that paper. He would call upon every gentleman who heard him make the statement to testify whether he had not used the words "Let me not be misunderstood," &c. and he had done so because of the whisper before alluded to, which had made him feel as though there were assassins more insidious than those who used the steel to lay low their victim—the assassins of men's reputation, assassins of character, who were ready for murder, for any one expression which might, at a moment when he was speaking extemporaneously and without notes, accidentally fall from his lips. He was fully aware that there were those ready, the moment such expression had been uttered, to trumpet it forth to the world that he had acknowledged himself an assassin on the floor of the House.

He put it to all honorable gentlemen, was his conduct like that of an assassin? When he had made his statement to the House, he had divulged every thing, not only what he had done, but how he had felt on that occasion; and he meant to say, and did say, he felt that the accused stood in a very doubtful position, in the position of an assassin, and Mr. W. expected that his friend would have been riddled with a dirk. This was what he had said, and he said so fully; and when he faltered on such an occasion, to draw a weapon to protect a friend, he hoped his right arm might forget its cunning; that it might wither, and be cut off. If the accused had drawn a weapon, if he had one, which Mr. W. did believe at the time, it never would have done its execution. Mr. W. said he had prevented his friend from doing violence if he intended any; but whether he had so intended, or whether he merely intended to intimidate the accused, to repress his insolence, Mr. W. could not say; but it was he (Mr. W.) and he alone, who had personally interfered to prevent collision between his friend and the accused, and this the witnesses had proved satisfactorily. He then reiterated that he did utter on that floor, at the time he made his statement to the House, those very words, and in that connection—"Let me not be misunderstood, let me not be misrepresented"—as he was apprehensive, from what he had before said, that he was likely to be wholly and villainously misrepresented.

Mr. DAWSON objected to this interrogatory; and he did so, because, as he understood it, there was an effort making on the part of the defence to attack what might be considered as the testimony before the House of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) and an honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton.) If these two gentlemen were not upon their trial, then they were competent witnesses, and had the best right to declare on that floor what statements had and what had not been made by them; but if they were arraigned, then their declarations were not good evidence before the House. This course of proceeding was entirely new, and went to reverse the testimony of every man who might be considered as giving evidence; and this testimony which was now brought before the House, if it was not intended to put these two gentlemen before alluded to upon their trial, was useless, as those gentlemen certainly were the best witnesses as to what they had said on the subject. If the House considered these gentlemen in the light of witnesses, let them testify themselves, and receive that testimony. But if this kind of testimony was to be admitted before the House which the learned Counsel had there introduced, whenever an honorable gentleman of the House should give evidence as to what he had said on a particular occasion, which was not in accordance with the opinions of others, this kind of testimony might be brought in to disprove his whole statement. The statement made by those gentlemen he contended ought to be taken from their printed remarks, as written out by themselves. He would ask of the Speaker, and through him, of the House of Representatives, whether they would suffer printed statements procured in this way to be held up to contradict the statements of honorable gentlemen of that House? Whether they would hold up a stenographic report as true, and the statements of honorable gentlemen as false? As he had said on a preceding day, they were diverging widely from the point at issue, and he now arose for the purpose of begging of honorable gentlemen not to permit this course of proceeding to be continued. So long as he could, he would protest against this course of oppression and injustice, in putting gentlemen before that House upon their trial in this indirect manner. If it was the intention to put these two gentlemen upon trial, let it be boldly announced, so that they might prepare for their defence, but not render them incompetent witnesses at the same time that you deny that they are upon trial. Every gentleman who had common sense must see that, instead of prosecuting an examination for a contempt of the House, they were prosecuting an inquiry into the conduct of two honorable members of that House; and here was a reporter, for one of the city papers brought up to disprove the statements of honorable gentlemen on that floor! Mr. D. knew this gentleman, and would as soon believe him as any gentleman on that floor; and, from the reports in the Globe, and his acquaintance with the witness, who was then on the stand, he hesitated not to say that he was as competent a reporter as any other in that House; but, at the same time, he did not think even that gentlemen would say that he could take down every word and sentiment of the members of that House as they uttered them. Mr. WISE here put into the hands of the gentleman from Georgia, a copy of the Globe, pointing out to him the very qualification he had spoken of, and which in the Globe report follows in the order of time in which it was spoken. In the speech of Mr. W. as written out by that gentleman himself, it is made immediately to follow his declaration of his intentions with regard to the accused.

It was sent to the Clerk's table, and read as follows: "Mr. W. had told even his secret intentions; that is they were his own private intentions at the time, and he had neither concealed nor omitted a single thought, but let him not be misunderstood as to that intention. He should only have interposed to protect his friend from imminent danger. His (Mr. W.'s) actual interposition spoke for itself. It was peaceful. It was to prevent any further disorder."

Mr. DAWSON continued. Then there was the confirmation of the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia, and he would take this occasion to say that he would as soon depend upon a report of this gentleman (Mr. Moore) as upon any other in the United States; but he did not consider that it was proper to propound a question of this kind to him. Honorable gentlemen, members of that House, had made the assertion that statements published by them were as they had made them in the House, and would the House permit a question of this kind to be propounded with the hope of proving those statements false? Did this question correspond with the feelings of honorable representatives on that floor? He appealed to honorable members of that House to say whether they would go beyond every thing that was just and proper in the persecution of individuals who had no means of defending themselves? He asked of the House of Representatives, whether they would permit questions of this kind to be introduced, to impugn the conduct of members of the body? and when they should desire to introduce testimony in their defence, would you deny them the opportunity? Every gentleman who understood this subject at all, must know that it was not an investigation as to a contempt committed by Reuben M. Whitney; but as to the conduct of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise.) Every gentleman must admit this, and none could deny it.

Mr. JONES, counsel for the accused, rejoined, and argued that they had the right, and that it was entirely proper, that the interrogatory should be propounded to the witness. (From Mr. J.'s lawiness of voice, the confusion, stir, and buzz, in the hall at the time, especially near the reporter's desk, and the distant position occupied by the learned Counsel, not two consecutive sentences of his remarks were audible to the reporters. For these reasons, they regret their inability to furnish even a synopsis of the arguments of the learned gentleman.)

We understood Mr. JONES to say in substance, that he could not for the life of him, see the logic of the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, nor how a speech written out by himself, after its delivery, could prove the truth or falsehood respecting the speech actually delivered. Reporters not being omniscient could not report what the honorable member meant to have said, but what he did say.

Mr. DAWSON then withdrew his objection, and

The witness returned the following answer:

Answer.—I cannot answer this question, without time being given me to read the statements alluded to in the interrogatory; for the reason that I have never seen the report of Mr. Wise's remarks, as printed, until this morning, and have not yet seen the printed remarks of Mr. Peyton at all.

[This interrogatory was returned to the witness, who, by consent, was allowed time to read the speeches referred to, and to return his answer. Pending this, the following proceedings took place.]

Mr. WISE then asked the general consent of the House to call the Reporter for the Intelligencer, from whose notes, aided by his own recollection, Mr. W. had written out his speech for that paper, which was agreed to.

Testimony of JOHN WHITEHEAD, Reporter.

Question by Mr. WISE.—Will you please state whether you did not furnish Mr. Wise with your notes, as a reporter of the Intelligencer, of his remarks in the House, narrating and explaining the occurrences in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman, in the matter of difficulty between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney; and whether you can now vouch for the general correctness of the report of these remarks in the Intelligencer, particularly the report of the paragraph or sentence commencing "let me not be misunderstood," &c. &c.?

Answer.—Yes, I did supply Mr. Wise with the report of the statement which he made to the House, narrating the occurrences in the committee of which Mr. Garland is chairman. I can and do vouch for the general correctness of the report as contained in the Intelligencer; and particularly the report of the paragraph commencing "Let me not," &c. I distinctly recollect the sentence being uttered, viz: "I had drawn a weapon it should not have done its execution."

Question by Mr. WISE.—Did you not distinctly understand Mr. Wise to say, on the occasion of making the remarks referred to, that he would have interfered in a forcible way only to protect his friend, Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—I understood Mr. Wise, in his statement, distinctly to say and to imply, that he would only have made use of violence in the event of his seeing a weapon drawn by the other party.

The witness was then discharged.

Mr. WISE then said if gentlemen and the House would permit him, he could name, out of those members who sat around him at the time he made the statement, several gentlemen who would confirm the statement published in the Intelligencer. He would call upon the honorable Mr. Cambreleng, the honorable Mr. Calhoun of Kentucky, and the honorable Mr. Chetwood, to say whether the statement in that paper was or was not correct; especially that part of it, "Let me not be misunderstood," &c.

Mr. JONES, counsel for the accused, said he certainly could have no objection to this. Those gentlemen might make their statements in their places as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of that report.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then said that he was in the House at the time the gentleman from Virginia had made his statement, and his recollection of that statement was similar to the statement the gentleman had made a short time since. Mr. C. had not read the printed statement in the Intelligencer; but the remarks of the gentleman on the occasion alluded to were substantially the same as those made by him to-day.

Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky then said that his recollection of the statement was precisely similar to that of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Cambreleng.) He remembered to have heard the observations alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, and thought he could not be mistaken.

Mr. WISE said he could call upon twenty members of the House, of different parties, to testify to this same fact, but he hoped the House and the country would now be satisfied that this statement was correct.

Mr. JONES, the counsel for the accused, then informed the House that they had got through with all the oral testimony which they proposed introducing at that time, and said he held in his hand certain documentary evidence which they intended to introduce. The evidence alluded to, he said, were extracts from the accredited speeches of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) which extracts went to show the quo animo of the other proceedings of those gentlemen against the accused. He considered this proposition as necessary to show the state of feeling which existed in the breasts of those gentlemen towards the accused; but in so doing, it was not their intention to mutilate these speeches, and take small portions of them, but to lay them before the House in extenso. To save time, however, they only proposed the reading of such portions of them as bore upon the point at issue, yet the whole speeches were before the House, so that any gentleman might examine them for him self.

Mr. BELL thought this a remarkable course in the learned Counsel. It was very inconvenient to encumber the journal by this kind of evidence; but if gentlemen insisted upon it, he must insist that the whole speeches be inserted on the journal. He could not consent that gentlemen should select particular passages from speeches delivered on that floor, and have them inserted on the journal as evidence, without giving the whole.

Mr. JONES, the counsel for the accused, said that the speeches were very lengthy, and upon other subjects wholly irrelevant to the matter at issue; therefore, he did not deem it necessary to encumber the journal with those parts which had no connection with the case of the accused.

Mr. BELL would not object if there was an opportunity to lay the whole of these speeches on the journal, but he could not see that it would be proper to select particular extracts, and insert them separately.

Mr. PICKENS said he must object to this course of proceeding.

Mr. JONES then sent to the clerk's table, to be read, a proposition, asking to have inserted on the journal various extracts of speeches delivered by Messrs. Peyton and Wise.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose and said he meant to object to these extracts going upon the journal.

The CHAIR (which was temporarily filled by Mr. BRIGGS) said that the Counsel at that time only asked for the reading of the motion which he had submitted.

Mr. PEYTON hoped gentlemen would not object to this testimony.

The Clerk then read the proposition, as follows:

"The accused now offers in evidence Mr. Wise's speech in this House, on the 14th April, 1836, and Mr. Peyton's, on the 19th April, 1836, 1st July, 1836, and 9th January, 1837, and points to certain passages therein, referring to the accused by name, as containing evidence which he deems material to his defence, in showing the vindictive feelings of both gentlemen to the accused, and the quo animo with which he has been summoned, at the instance of Mr. Wise, before the select committee, whereof he is chairman. The accused selects from said speeches the following passages, as having the tendency above indicated, but save the whole of the speeches as evidence before the House, so that the House, or any member, may refer to, and read at pleasure, as a part of the evidence, the whole, or any other parts of said speeches not comprised in the extracts relied on by the accused."

"Extract from Mr. WISE'S speech, on the 14th of April, 1836, in the pamphlet form, viz:

"And who is Reuben M. Whitney, that he should be the favored man of all men, in fastening upon the spots of the public purse, and that he should be protected by gentlemen from the scrutiny of investigation, as if in the sanctuary? Who is he who is suffered to insult a representative by his villainous cards, in the official organ, for daring to offer a resolution of investigation? An infamous wretch who took the oath of allegiance to Great Britain, in Canada, during the last year, and who has since taken a false oath against his neighbor."

"This blasted monument" is Reuben M. Whitney! How came he in charge of the forty millions of the treasure of this land? Did not Mr. Secretary know him? Sir, I believe it can be proved that the former Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Tacey) refused or promised to refuse, to recognize this perjured villain and traitor, as an agent of the banks, on account of his character. How comes he now in pay and employment? Who employs him? Sir, Reuben M. Whitney is nothing but his connection with the public Treasury is something. It is almost enough in itself to give assurance of corruption and wrong, when such a person is the selected and approved agent of the Treasury!"

Extract from Mr. PEYTON'S speech of the 19th April, 1836, in pamphlet form.

"Sir, why fear this investigation? Why should Whitney be screened? A cloud rests upon his name; the guilt of perjury has been fastened upon him; and yet, without any known check, without any legal responsibility, he is employed in an agency implying the very highest possible trust and confidence. He knows that he has a powerful party to rally around him; that those who employ him dare not consent to a disclosure of the object of his employment. But will honorable gentlemen here connive at such practices? Why, sir, through means of this agency, Mr. Van Buren is gathering to himself the most formidable influence that ever existed in the person of one man. The wealth of Cæsar, and the military power of Pompey were once brought to bear against the people of Rome in their election of Chief Magistrate. And what was the consequence? Civil war and bloodshed! The magistrates corrupted, or dragged, wounded and bleeding from the arena! The people humbled down, and slaughtered like wild beasts!"

Extract of Mr. PEYTON'S speech of the 1st of July, 1836, published in the Nashville Republican of Aug. 30, 1836.

"Let me call the attention of the gentleman, and I allude to the subject for his special consideration, to the memorable resolution of my friend from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) to investigate the conduct, the frauds of your pet, Reuben M. Whitney, a dishonored, disgraced, perjured traitor as he is."

Extract from Mr. PEYTON'S speech of the 3d of January, 1837, published in the National Intelligencer of the 9th of January, 1837.

"Sir, during the present session of Congress I had occasion to go into the Treasury Department, and, on showing open the front door, the first thing that met my eye, full in front, was 'R. M. WHITNEY,' blazing in capitals as large as the sign of a livery stable! Now, sir, if he is a private citizen, what is he doing with a sign? If he has quit business stealing, why not take down his sign? What is he doing in the Treasury Department? How came he there? You might as well turn a horse into a new ground field, and tell him not to bite the pumpkins, as to turn Reuben M. Whitney into the Treasury, and tell him not to steal the money.

And, lastly, that he is suspected, upon evidence strong enough to send a poor man to the penitentiary, of plundering the Treasury; of being a sort of general, federal rogue, employed by a company to steal by the year for them. This closes the account. And Reuben truly has a claim to greatness—a great traitor, a great liar, and a great rogue."

Mr. PICKENS objected. He said he had been sitting by long enough, looking on this illegal and monstrous course of proceeding. He called upon the House to know whether they were prepared to open up this new field of evidence. He had understood the learned Counsel to say that this evidence was proposed to be introduced to show the quo animo of these gentlemen towards the accused. Mr. P. said he should like to know what gentlemen meant by the quo animo of the speeches of gentlemen on that floor. Was this to be introduced on a question of a contempt or no contempt? If he understood the argument of gentlemen right, this evidence was attempted to be introduced to prove that a chairman of a select committee, before whom Mr. Whitney had been summoned to appear, had exercised the right of using violent language towards Mr. Whitney, and, in consequence of this, Whitney had refused to appear before the committee. Now, illegal as this testimony was, so far as it related to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), and every lawyer must know it to be so, yet how much more illegal and fallacious was it to introduce the speeches of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton), who had nothing to do with the subpoena which had been issued, requiring the attendance of this witness before the select committee, and who was not a member of the committee at all. Under what principle of justice or law could you introduce speeches of that gentleman to justify a contempt of that House. The true question was contempt or no contempt; a contempt for disobeying a summons duly issued and served upon him, and which when brought to the bar of the House, the accused admitted he had disobeyed. The question then for the House to settle was the question of contempt or no contempt. This was not an examination of the accused but an examination to ascertain whether the course of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) had been justifiable or not; whether the pretext and cause set up in the defence for not obeying the mandate of the committee was a good one or not. Was there any lawyer on that floor who would pretend to say that this was evidence in a case of contempt? But instead of confining the testimony to the gentleman from Virginia, who was chairman of the committee before which the accused had refused to appear, they now had the monstrous proposition before them, of bringing in as evidence the speeches of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton), who has had nothing to do with that committee. Whitney had not urged that as a pretext for refusing to appear before the committee, and he asked gentlemen if they were to go into this monstrous field of testimony. If so, they might go back to the United States Bank investigating committee, whose reports had designated the accused as a perjured man. Mr. P. for one, protested against this proceeding. He could not longer sit silent under the monstrous course this trial had assumed, when the broad proposition was submitted to the American Congress, of going into an examination, perhaps for years back, of the speeches, not only of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), but also of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton.) Now he asked if this was legal, or if it was according to any rule which governed courts of law in such cases. He must say that this proceeding began to partake somewhat of a political aspect, and if it was intended to have those speeches laid before the country for political effect, it was a fraud upon the established usage of the House under the Constitution, and a prostration of the dignity and respect of the body; and he, for one, protested against this most outrageous proceeding, and demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the testimony to be inserted on the journal.

Mr. PEYTON appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) to withdraw any objection which he might conceive himself bound to make as a representative on that floor, to any evidence thought necessary by the Counsel of the accused to introduce from the speeches that had been read. Mr. P. did not object, and he hoped no friend of his there would object to the widest possible latitude that could be taken. Indeed he was willing that every speech of his, there or elsewhere, should be used by the accused in his defence, or in his behalf, to any and every extent that might be possible.

Mr. P. had remarked, when up before, that he could prove every word of the charges made by himself in those speeches. He would qualify it so far as to say, that he believed they could all be substantially proved, and that by witnesses who had been already before the select committee, if the majority had permitted the questions to be propounded. From private conversations with them, he had the strongest belief that many of them could have testified to the facts of the treason, and of the perjury of Whitney. Sir, said Mr. P. when I propounded the question which covered the general character of this man, some dear friend of his would object to it, and it was voted down by the majority in every instance. The man shrunk from an investigation of this kind before the House and the country, though he had himself challenged it through the columns of the official organ. Sir, I wished to introduce proof of his character, and if I did not establish that he is as infamous and as base a traitor and perjurer as I have ever charged him to be, why, then, I am willing he shall have all the benefit of my failure.

Mr. GHOLSON said he would call any gentleman to order who made remarks out of order, and he insisted that this discussion was so.

Mr. PICKENS said, as an individual, he would, with great pleasure, yield to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, but, as a representative, he felt compelled to decline; believing, as he did, the whole proceeding to be not only irregular but disgraceful.

Mr. WISE raised the point of order, and called for the decision of the Chair upon it: whether the resolution regulating the mode of proceeding in the examination of witnesses, and raising objections to them, embraced documentary as well as oral testimony. If it did not, and he could not himself tell, for he had not read it, then this motion to object was clearly out of order.

Mr. BRIGGS informed the gentleman that the order he had referred to applied to both.

The CHAIR so ruled, and desired the Clerk to read the order; which having been done,

Mr. WISE said, I am satisfied, sir.

Mr. KEY would simply reply to what he considered the very extraordinary objections urged against this resolution, that if his learned friend (Mr. Walter Jones) and himself were unlearned in matters of parliamentary law, and as to what sort of evidence was the law of that House, they should hope to be excused. It was certainly very excusable for them to be ignorant of that of which all the world was ignorant except the honorable members of the body itself. Mr. K. and his friend had had but little experience in parliament, but as the argument he could offer in support of this application was the authority of the House itself, he should rely upon that authority, as well also as upon the reason and justice of the application itself; and he trusted he should be able to show that there was no sort of validity in the objections, the very warm objections, that had been raised against it.

Why, sir, said Mr. K. has there not been evidence in this case produced against the accused? His card, for instance, which is said to have justified the wrath on the part of certain honorable members of the House against him? Has not that card been read before the House? Has it not been read for the purpose of showing a vindication of the insult he had met with? Has it not been read for the purpose of justifying and excusing the conduct made use of towards him? And is this House going to stop there? Is this House going to stop at that card? Sir, is it not plain, simple, manifest justice to allow the accused person against whom that card is brought, to produce the publications which gave rise to it, and to put in the declarations made use of against him, which very declarations had demanded from him a public disavowal in the terms and language of that card? Will it be said, sir, that this House proceeds to allow evidence which is to show the accused is without excuse, and yet not suffer him to produce evidence of the malicious, malignant, and violent circumstances and persecutions which drew from him that card? Why, sir, it does seem to me too plain a proposition to question, and I am only surprised that the learned and honorable member who has objected to the introduction of those speeches should have forgotten that that card, or rather the introduction of that card, is the evidence upon which we predicate, as regards one of the gentlemen, (Mr. Peyton) the right to use his speeches before this House.

The honorable gentleman who makes the objection, seems to admit that there may be some grounds for offering the speeches of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), but denies that there are any grounds justifying us in offering the speeches of the gentleman from Tennessee. If, however, the honorable member had remembered the card, he would have seen, by the way in which it had been introduced, and the circumstances which grew out of it, that we have the right to bring evidence justifying its publication.

As to the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Speaker, can any thing in the world be plainer than that we have the right to show the state of feeling, the state of hostility, subsisting in his breast towards the accused before the publication of that card? The gentleman is chairman of the committee before whom this accused man is called to give testimony; nay, more, sir; it is at the gentleman's own motion the accused is summoned; and shall we not produce his speeches, to show his state of feeling towards the individual whom he has thus called before him? Sir, shall we not show that he has denounced the accused as a perjured wretch? And is a "perjured wretch" to be called before a committee to give testimony which might charge any body else? Or, even if it be to charge himself, is it to be pretended that any gentleman can justify the calling the accused before a committee to have interrogatories propounded for the express purpose of criminating himself?

But, sir, I need not argue upon the propriety and justice of the course we have been bound to take in regard to the accused on this occasion. In the case of Houston, he was allowed to offer in excuse for his conduct, in having actually assaulted a member out of the House, a publication of that member. It was discussed and decided that he had the right to offer the speeches of Mr. Stansbury in evidence; and further, there was allowed to the accused on that occasion an opportunity of the learned and honorable gentlemen, who have made these charges against the prisoner, come forward and make them good, if they can. If they have got evidence by which they can sustain their allegations, let it come out. We, sir, will not let the accused have charged with grooves and great offences, but hear it avowed by the gentleman from Tennessee that he believes those charges to be true. I do not doubt it, Mr. Speaker; I can only lament that such communications have been furnished to him as to have induced him to believe such accusations without trial, without investigation, without the prisoner having had an opportunity any where to exhibit proof of his innocence. How is he to get a trial? Can he come forward to disprove these accusations? The gentleman hearsay information of witnesses called before the select committee with whom he has had conversations! The question was asked before that committee as to the character of Mr. Whitney, though he was not present; and because gentlemen objected to the materiality or relevancy of the question to the object for which the committee was raised, hence the honorable member from Tennessee takes all this hearsay information as establishing, or going to establish, the truth of his accusations. Sir, I say here, that, acting upon the authority of Houston's case, we have an undoubted right to go behind that card, and adduce what brought it out. The admitted declarations of those gentlemen the House ought to receive. If there was no proof in the hands of those gentlemen to show that they believed the accused guilty, let it appear; at least let him have a trial, and a fair opportunity of defence; and I here pledge myself he will never shrink from it.

Mr. PICKENS understood the learned Counsel to make a distinct proposition, viz: that the gentleman from Tennessee should be allowed to prove his allegations. With that under standing, Mr. P. would withdraw his objection.

Mr. PEYTON. I am quite ready to go into it, sir.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I will renew the objection if it be withdrawn.

Mr. KEY. Mr. Speaker, we wish it to be distinctly understood that we are ready, now or at any time, to go into it. We shall not shrink from any investigation that can be made, here or elsewhere.

In reference to the question before the House, he repeated that it was settled in the case of Houston, and stood upon the broad and immutable principle of manifest justice.

Mr. PICKENS. With the understanding before referred to, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I renew it, Mr. Speaker, and I will briefly state my reasons. Mr. C. was proceeding to do so, when

Mr. CLAIBORNE of Mississippi called the gentleman to order, on the ground that the House could not entertain reasons a second time on the same question.

Mr. MERCER. If the decision of the chair is that the gentleman from New York has no right to speak, then I appeal from that decision.

The SPEAKER. The chair has not uttered one word!

Mr. MCKAY. Has the gentleman from South Carolina unconditionally withdrawn his objection?

Mr. PICKENS. I do withdraw it unconditionally.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I renew it, and will proceed to give—

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I call the gentleman to order, Mr. Speaker, and insist upon the decision of the Chair whether, under the resolution prescribing the mode of proceeding, more than two speeches can be made to one question.

The CHAIR remarked that there was no difficulty upon the question of order whatever. If one member made an objection, and was heard upon it, by withdrawing the objection he certainly could not inhibit any other member from making an objection; and if he could not inhibit another from objecting, neither could he prevent him from stating the ground of his objections. The converse of this would give the member objecting the power of speaking himself, and of precluding every other member of the House from speaking, on any question.

Mr. CAMBRELENG had but a word or two to say. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens), had, he said, expressed some of the strongest objections to this proposition, but Mr. C.'s principal objection was this. They had but a few days remaining of the session, and if this business was not finished that night, he feared the appropriation bills would be lost. He really thought every member was tired with this case, and had no desire to go farther into it, nor did he think the House was about to take its business out of its own hands, and send it to the committees below stairs.

Mr. PICKENS then withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, and the proposition to introduce this testimony was lost without a division.

Mr. GHOLSON, from the committee appointed to conduct the examination, then arose and announced that the Counsel for the accused had closed, so far, their oral testimony, but desired, through him, to submit a proposition to the House. They had furnished him with a list or memorandum of certain portions of the journal of the select committee of which the Hon. Mr. Garland of Virginia was chairman, with a request that a clerk be directed to transcribe them for the use of Counsel and the members. The reason of the request was this—the journal was then in the hands of the printer, and could not, without very great inconvenience, be spared from the printing office; because, if it was, it could not be printed in time for the report. He therefore moved that a clerk be appointed to make such extracts for the purpose above mentioned.

Mr. PEYTON rose to inquire of the honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. Gholson), and the learned Counsel of the accused, whether they would be unwilling that the same clerk should likewise furnish copies or extracts from the journal, showing all the questions propounded to, and the answers returned thereto by, witnesses upon the same points upon which questions had been propounded in the House. The learned Counsel would understand Mr. P.'s meaning. It was this. Some few of the witnesses had responded to the inquiry, as to whether the accused was known to them, and that favorably or unfavorably, for capacity, as well as integrity. These, Mr. P. would want. He also wished extracted, from the same journal, copies of all the questions on this subject that were propounded, whether responded to or not, either before the committee or elsewhere. He could not think the Counsel would object to it.

Mr. GHOLSON explained the extent the committee proposed the call should go, and the gentleman could see if it would satisfy him.

They proposed, then, to have extracts made of all the answers to the 29th interrogatory, which was in the following words:

"At the time he [i. e. the accused] was so designated, were you acquainted with him personally; and was he favorably known to you, either for capacity or integrity?"

Mr. G. supposed that would satisfy the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PEYTON. If I understand the gentleman correctly, I accede to his proposition, which is, that we have extracts made of all questions and of all answers upon that subject, either before the committee or elsewhere.

Mr. GHOLSON. All that took place in and before the committee, that appears on the journal.

Mr. PEYTON. To be sure, as well the questions propounded, as the answers upon that subject. I want all that appears upon the journals upon that subject.

Mr. GHOLSON. That is my understanding of what the Counsel proposes; every thing connected with the 29th interrogatory.

Mr. PEYTON. But that interrogatory does not get out one-half one-tenth, one-fifth of what is on the journal.

Mr. THOMAS. I will remind the gentleman from Tennessee that yesterday, on motion of Counsel, the whole journal of the select committee was made part of the proceedings of this House; and the entire journal will, therefore, be in possession of the House before probably this investigation will close. But, in any event, any member of the House, it being part of the proceedings, can designate that part of the journal he may desire to use in any discussion that may arise, and be furnished with it without any special order.

Mr. PEYTON. If so, then why do Counsel call for any particular part of it?

Mr. GHOLSON. I will again explain to the gentleman. The chairman of the select committee (Mr. Garland) informs me that it is impossible to get that journal entire, from the fact that it will not be out of the hands of the printer before next Thursday, and surely we will get clear of Mr. Whitney before that time.

Mr. BELL. It seems to me proper to bring the entire journal. Mr. WISE. That journal, or any portion of that journal, brought here to prove the general character of the accused for truth and veracity, or for common integrity, will be insufficient. I wish to know if gentlemen will prove, by witnesses, who were introduced before that committee, the specific facts touching the integrity of this man. I will name one instance. There was introduced before that committee, a gentleman of this city of the highest respectability, to testify to the fact, that this man, who is now called "the accused," was a fraudulent and dishonest man as a debtor.

Mr. BRIGGS. I call the gentleman to order, Mr. Speaker. I do conceive this is not the time for making charges.

Mr. WISE. I am making a question of the introduction of testimony, not a charge; and I think the gentleman will understand me when he hears me through. Well, questions were propounded to that witness, and also the particular question as to the specific fact, but the committee objected; and whether he could have proved it or not, was to be tested. It can be done, now as well as then. If these extracts are taken to bring in that witness before this House, and simply testify here what that committee would not inquire into—if that be the object, why then I have, sir, the fullest latitude will be given.

Mr. PEYTON. I think, sir, I have not been sufficiently understood. They wish the positive evidence, I wish the negative evidence. I will illustrate my idea, so that, if possible, I can not be misunderstood. One of the witnesses who testified favorably of the accused, and whose answer they have required to be produced by the clerk, stated that the accused was known to him individually favorably, both for integrity and capacity. But to this question, and which appears on the journal, "Were you acquainted with the general character of the accused when he resided in the city of Philadelphia, and, if so, what was his character for honesty and veracity? Would you believe him upon his oath, in a court of justice, from his general character?" That question, Mr. Speaker, was not only not answered, but was voted down by the committee, a majority of whom supposed it was not proper to be put.

Another question was this: "Was it not universally understood in Philadelphia that, during the late war, he (Whitney) was a British Commissary, and engaged in smuggling gold, and driving cattle from the United States to pay and feed the British soldiers?" That question, sir, stands on the journal, and they skulked from that, also.

Another question was, "Did he not maintain there the character of a common black-leg, as the keeper of a faro bank in that city?"

Another was, "Is not the accused a notorious bankrupt at this time?"

Mr. GHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman to order. What is his object, sir?

Mr. GLASCOCK. I shall object to the proposition made by the gentleman from Tennessee. These are matters with which this House has nothing to do.

Mr. PEYTON. I will state my object in a few words, with this further remark. What I want from the journal is the evidence I have already stated, and the entry of the additional fact which I offered to prove by a witness, and which evidence was suppressed by the friends of the accused, viz: That he is a bankrupt to a large amount, and that he has been guilty of every dishonest practice to defraud his creditors, living at this time within the bounds in this city, in a style of princely splendor and extravagance, and that he has actually told his creditors that if they would not come to his terms he would swear—

Mr. VANDERPOEL. Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to call the gentleman to order. Here are charges of the most grave character, brought against a man now at your bar, who has not, cannot have, the opportunity of reply. I put it to the gentleman himself whether it is fair.

Mr. KEY. Mr. Speaker, the counsel for the accused wish to submit a proposition to the House, which I hold in my hand.

The CHAIR said he entertained at the commencement of this matter—

Mr. PEYTON. I want the whole of the testimony!

The CHAIR, order! The CHAIR said he had supposed that, by general consent, some agreement would have been come to between the committee on the part of the House, the Counsel for the accused, and the members generally. Entertaining this view, the Chair had suffered the debate thus far to progress, but the whole of it was irregular on both sides. If the Counsel for the accused had not finished their testimony, but had any further testimony to offer, they would proceed to do so; or if they had any request to make, they would submit their motion in writing, and then it would be regularly ascertained whether any member of the House objected to it.

Mr. McKAY. I object, sir.

Mr. GLASCOCK. I have objected.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope gentlemen will not object till they hear it!

The CHAIR stated that the examination was in the hands of the accused and his Counsel, and the Chair had only entertained suggestions under the idea that some agreement would have been arrived at. Finding, however, that difficulties had arisen, he must now intimate to the Counsel that they would proceed regularly till they had closed their testimony. Any request they wished to make, out of this course, must be reduced to writing.

Mr. MERCER. I wish to submit a question of order to the Speaker. A question similar to that which I am about to propound was suggested to the Chair a short time ago, the answer to which was not satisfactory to me. If the Chair will examine the language of the order of the House, in reference to the mode of proceeding in this case, and under which we are now acting, he will perceive that authority given to the respondent, by that order, is to "examine witnesses." The word "testimony" is subsequently introduced into the order. I consider, therefore, sir, the whole of the last part of our proceedings entirely irregular, inasmuch as it is a departure from that order. We have not been examining witnesses for some time, and if there be no other witness to examine, I have a resolution in my hand which I wish to submit.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I make this point of order, that according to the rule the House has adopted, and under which the proceedings in this case are conducted, no proposition whatever can be recognised, other than that growing out of questions to be propounded to witnesses, and such proceedings as may grow out of them.

Mr. THOMAS asked leave to read his proposition, with a view, he said, that the House might judge of its propriety.

There being no objection, the proposition was accordingly read in substance as follows: Ordering, that the Clerk of the House cause extracts to be made from the journal of the select committee of certain portions thereof therein indicated.

The CHAIR said there was a witness (Mr. Moore) then on the stand, who had had time to prepare his answer, and the Chair was informed that he had been ready for some time to give it in.

The answer of Mr. Moore, for which time had been given him, was then handed in as follows:

Answer.—I have read the remarks of Mr. Peyton and Mr. Wise, as printed in the Globe, and it is my opinion that, in their general tenor, the remarks of both these gentlemen, as there given, correspond essentially with my recollection of them as delivered on the floor of the House.

Cross examination of Mr. Moore.

Question by Mr. WISE.—Do you not distinctly recollect that Mr. Wise did utter the remarks commencing with the words, "Let me not be misunderstood," &c. & I and what did you understand him in substance to say, and to mean, in explaining his act and intention in interposing between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney?

Mr. JONES, Counsel for the accused, objected to this interrogatory, and he did so because the interrogatory called upon the witness to give his understanding of the words used by the honorable gentleman, whereas, as a reporter, he should only give his language, and let every one draw their own inference from it.

Mr. WISE believed if the learned Counsel had looked more particularly into the interrogatory, he would have found that it did not call upon the witness for his construction of the language used on the occasion, but only asked him for his recollection of the words. In the first place, it asks him whether he recollects distinctly the words, and in the second place it asks him for his understanding, that is his memory and recollection of the words which he (Mr. W.) had uttered, and the meaning which those words imported to him at the time.

He would be glad if the learned Counsel would instruct him how to ask the witness this question, as he was inexperienced. What he desired to ask was, how the witness had understood him on that occasion. He wished to ask him for the words, and the meaning of those words, as he comprehended them, and what sensations they had created in his breast at the time. His object was not to accuse the accused, but to defend himself. He knew, from the course pursued by the learned Counsel in this examination, that an effort was making to convict him of having made use of the expressions, and entertained the feelings, of an assassin. That it might be made to appear to the world he had made declarations of his sentiments and feelings, on that floor, which held out the idea that he was a character wholly unsafe for this gentleman to appear before as chairman of the committee. Mr. W. should not vote to make this witness appear before the committee, nor would he vote at all in his case; but as far as he could, he meant to demonstrate, before the investigation was got through with, that this was not an individual matter; and if the House carried on this investigation as it should, and called upon the accused to purge himself of this contempt, he did not expect the accused himself would say before God and the country that he was afraid to appear before the investigating committee, of which he (Mr. W.) was chairman on account of anything he had said on that floor.

Mr. W. hoped the learned Counsel would withdraw his objections to this interrogatory, as he believed questions of a similar character had been propounded to witnesses without objection. This question did not go to prove the guilt of the accused, but it went to prove the innocence of Mr. W. himself.

The question was then put, and it was decided without a division that the interrogatory should be propounded to the witness.

Mr. Moore then returned the following answer.

Answer.—I have a distinct recollection that the words referred to in this question, were uttered by Mr. Wise, certainly in substance. The meaning which I attached to them at that time was, that Mr. Wise would only have interposed by violence to protect the life of his friend, Mr. Peyton, in case he, Mr. Wise, had seen a movement, or the indication of a movement, towards violence on the part of the accused. In that event alone, did I understand that Mr. Wise would have interposed otherwise than by conciliatory means.

Question by Mr. WISE.—Was the proof sheet of the report in the Globe, within your knowledge or information, submitted to by Mr. Wise for correction?

Answer.—The proof sheet was not submitted to Mr. Wise, either for revision or correction.

The witness was then discharged from the stand.

The question then recurred on the proposition just read and submitted to the House by Mr. THOMAS, and it being again read from the Clerk's table, objection was made to it; when,

Mr. GHOLSON moved a suspension of the rule, and the question being taken by tellers, the vote was—ayes 67, noes 52, no quorum.

Mr. GHOLSON moved a call of the House: lost without a division, as was also the motion to suspend the rule, [it having been ascertained, before putting the question, that a quorum was within the hall.]

Mr. KEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a very few words in explanation.

Mr. ALFORD. I object to those few words, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a question of order.

Mr. MERCER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BRIGGS. Sir, I rise myself to a question of order. I understand that the Counsel for the accused have progressed in their case, until they have come so far, where there is certain written testimony upon the journals of the committee, which they can not reach without an order of the House; and the Counsel move the Speaker, that the House will accordingly order that testimony, which is on the journals, to be produced before it. Now, if I am right in stating the request, I ask if the Speaker decides that this is in order, or not in order?

The CHAIR. In that form, the Chair will be compelled to say it is in order; but, nevertheless, it would still be in the power of a majority of the House to refuse it.

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly, sir. I now ask the Counsel if that be not the state of the question?

Mr. KEY. (one of the counsel.) Certainly, sir.

The CHAIR. This proceeding is assimilated to a proceeding in a court of justice. The accused is at the bar, and entitled to counsel by order of the House. He has had the special privilege given to him to examine his witnesses at a particular time; he is entitled to counsel to conduct his defence; and, of course, he has the right to submit a request to the court or to the House.

Mr. GLASCOCK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask how far this House, without the consent of that committee, [viz: the select committee of which Mr. Garland of Virginia was chairman,] have the right to control one particle of the testimony taken before that committee, until they report to this House? Sir, I deny that any of the proceedings in that committee can be considered as testimony before this House in their present inchoate state, or that they can be reached by any process of the House, or in any other way, except through the committee itself.

The CHAIR. That was the point to which the Chair endeavored to arrive before this difficulty arose, viz: to have a distinct proposition in writing before the House.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Speaker, if I had no other rights by staying here than my own, I would withdraw my resolution, and withdraw myself too, for I should have no business here any longer; but I am here as the representative of my constituents, and I ask that my resolution be read.

This was acceded to, and the resolution was read from the Clerk's table, as follows:

Be it resolved, That all further testimony in the case of Reuben M. Whitney be suspended, and that the committee of five members be instructed to prepare suitable interrogatories to be submitted to said Whitney, in order to enable him to purge himself of the contempt imputed to him.

The CHAIR stated to the gentleman from Virginia, that his resolution would be in order, but that there was a pending motion before the House at the instance of Counsel, [viz: the one intimated by Mr. KEY,] and whilst that motion was pending, another could not be received until it was disposed of. If the House negative or affirm that proposition, then the gentleman might submit his.

Mr. MERCER. That motion is withdrawn, sir.

The CHAIR inquired if the Counsel had withdrawn their proposition?

Mr. KEY. Not at all, sir.

The CHAIR so understood. He then inquired if the Counsel had suspended their proposition to enable the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Thomas) to present his?

Mr. KEY. The resolution presented by the gentleman from Maryland is our proposition, sir.

Mr. MERCER. That cannot be, sir. One proposition cannot be two.

The CHAIR explained that he certainly would not have entertained the motion to suspend the rule to introduce the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, if he had understood it to be the same motion Counsel intended to submit. He understood it to be a different one; and hence the Chair ruled it necessary to suspend the rule, in order to get it in. The Chair continued: The Counsel now makes his motion in writing. As Counsel, he has the right to move the Court. The Chair receives the motion; and it is for the House to determine whether they will grant the request or not. Pending that motion, however, no other can be received.

Mr. CALHOON of Ky. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee (viz: of examination,) through the Speaker, whether the questions put by the committee, or which purported to be put by the committee, have been agreed to by the members of that committee or not? Or, whether they have been put by a member of the committee upon his own responsibility, but as coming from the committee?

Mr. GHOLSON (chairman of the committee) replied by stating that three of the members of the committee agreed to submit the questions not only as coming from the committee, but with the concurrence of the counsel of the accused. This was done to get round a difficulty that appeared to prevail at the time.

The CHAIR directed the Clerk to read the propositions, which was done; the substance is given above, when it was moved by Mr. Thomas.

Mr. GLASCOCK said he should object to the adoption of that resolution, and would briefly, as he was aware the time of the House was very precious, state his reasons for doing so.

He had already intimated to the House that he did not consider it within the power of that House, or even if it were within its power, they ought not, to arrest the proceedings of that select committee of investigation, or make use of any evidence contained therein, until that committee had made their report, and that report had been finally adopted by the House. He had been given to understand that the report of that committee, as it was intended to be reported to the House, had not been finally agreed upon, and he held that it would be improper for the House to take any action upon the evidence elicited before that committee till the report was brought in and agreed upon by the House. They had constituted a committee for the purpose of examining into certain matters, as connected with the different departments of this Government, or a particular department of it, and, as was usual on such occasions, that committee had doubtless adopted for themselves rules and regulations by which they were to be governed. Now, among them, it was well known that the members of the committee were not even permitted to state what testimony had been given in before it, and that was one reason why he thought it would be premature for the House to adopt this resolution or order, until the committee itself had brought in their report, when the whole would be in the possession of the House, and such extracts could be taken as each member might require.

But, independent of this, let him ask if gentlemen did not foresee what this investigation must inevitably lead to, and what an unnecessary consumption of time would be the consequence, if this resolution be adopted? He had understood that all were disposed to bring this matter to a speedy close; yet there would seem a disposition, on the part of some, to lengthen out this investigation for the purpose of bringing out all that had transpired before the select committee. Why, by the adoption of this resolution, he contended, they would be re-assuming to themselves, and taking out of the hands of that committee, the power they had specially conferred upon it. If the proposed extracts were to be made from their report; (if it could be called a report, though no report had yet been made); if they could go into the office of the "Globe," and take away those incipient and imperfect proceedings, he would ask whether it would not necessarily be attaching to the proceeding before the House matters wholly irrelevant to the issue, so far as that issue involved the question of contempt? And that was the only question before the House. For his own part, Mr. G. was not prepared to attach to the proceedings in this case, testimony wholly unconnected and irrelevant to the present issue. What was the issue before that House and the country? The simple issue, he repeated, was, had or had not a contempt been committed by Mr. Whitney? Now he would ask the House if every question immediately connected with that issue, so far as related to the gentleman from Virginia, had not been extracted, had not been already drawn out from the witnesses already examined? Had not every thing which could bear upon the alleged contempt been fully attended to and investigated in their proceedings? What had the conduct of Mr. Whitney, except in relation to the particular question which gave rise to the difficulty, as connected with the investigation before the committee, to do with the present investigation? What possible bearing could such extracts as were now sought to be produced have upon the present issue, being, as they were, wholly unconnected with it? Where the necessity of making these extracts for the purpose of accompanying the other proceedings before the House? In his opinion, he must say, it would be a reflection upon the judgment of that House to adopt the resolution, except it could be shown that the questions Counsel seek to extract were relevant to the issue then pending? What would they behold? Gentlemen would, at their own discretion, extract such questions and such answers as they, in their judgment, would think proper; of course the two gentlemen from Virginia and Tennessee (Messrs. Wise and Peyton) would extract such as were calculated to reflect upon and expose the character of the present accused; the learned Counsel would extract all such matters as were calculated to respond to the others, and the investigation would never end. Mr. G. asked if such a latitude was ever allowed before any tribunal? For himself, he was disposed to tie down the parties to the proper and legal course of proceeding, and bring them to the direct issue. Adopt this order, and what would be the consequence? Why, as had been told them by the member from Tennessee, certain questions had been answered, some in one way, favorably to the accused; others had been answered directly the reverse, totally and wholly derogatory to his character; and would the House go into this matter? Why, they would be trying Mr. Whitney on an issue not before it; and taking from the hands of the committee the power specially delegated to it, and substituting the House itself to re-try the very issue it had submitted to its committee. This was the only construction that could be given to the proposition under consideration. Let not the House interfere with the proceedings of the investigating committee, but suffer them to make their report, and let the people judge for themselves when that report went forth to the country. Go into this now, and he hesitated not to say, that another week would be consumed in the investigation, and the whole of the public business of the country be left unacted on.

Mr. KEY, of counsel for the accused, exceedingly regretted that they were under the necessity of troubling the House with this matter, but it certainly was not their fault. If the evidence they desired was in the House, they could easily obtain copies from the Clerk, but it was not in possession of the Clerk; it was in the hands of the printers of the House, and it was necessary to have an order so that a clerk might be employed, to make a copy of the extracts desired, which he conceived would take but a very short time. If the extracts could be procured in any other manner than by this order, he had no objection to withdraw it; but if there was no other means of procuring them, he must respectfully urge the adoption of the order.

The motion of the Counsel was then agreed to, without a division, and the Clerk was ordered to furnish the extracts.

Mr. PATTON then submitted the following resolution: "Resolved, That it is not expedient further to prosecute the trial of Reuben M. Whitney, for the contempt of the House alleged to have been committed by him, and that he be now discharged."

Mr. PATTON said that he had from the beginning foreseen that the trial would assume the form and character which it had put on; that it would be protracted to a most unreasonable length, by the introduction of a vast mass of irrelevant testimony, and by the raising of an infinite number of questions of evidence, and that the prosecution of the inquiry must lead to heated debate and probably angry personal collision.

I think (said Mr. P.) it must be sufficiently manifest, if we attempt to go on regularly through this trial, receiving all that kind of testimony and pursuing that mode of investigation which the decisions of the House already have authorized, that there can be no termination of the case until the whole of the residue of the session, now barely sufficient for doing the public business of absolutely indispensable necessity, shall have been consumed. If we go on through the evidence, and are called on to pronounce a judgment on the merits, we must hear debate from the counsel of the accused and from many members of the House, which it would be exceedingly difficult to restrain by the means provided for arresting debate in an ordinary case of legislation. Under these circumstances, I have been meditating for some time to propose something which would put a stop to the case without any decision on the merits. I hope I may be permitted to say, and it may, perhaps, induce gentlemen on both sides to receive more favorably the proposition, that I have studiously and purposely abstained from voting upon any of the numerous questions of evidence which have arisen in the case. I have kept myself aloof from all the excitement which I was sure the case must elicit, in some measure in the hope that, from a position of that sort, a conciliatory motion, calculated to put a stop to a trial so disastrous to the discharge of the public legislation of the country, and to avoid the necessity of any decision on the merits of the case, might be acceptably received. I do verily believe that if one single speech, such as will be made, and perhaps must be made, from the very nature of the case, shall be delivered on this floor, consequences the most deplorable will follow; scenes of violence and personal collision, such as we are not accustomed even here to witness, as well as the valuable time of the House thrown away, so far as necessary legislation is concerned, without the hope of having any calm, dispassionate, or useful determination of the case itself which is under trial. Before we got involved in this case, I made an effort to prevent it by laying the report of the committee on the table. I would now renew that proposition, but the effect of that would be to leave the prisoner in custody. I have therefore proposed the resolution now under consideration for the purpose of effecting the same object; that is, to get rid of this case in the only practicable way, without coming to any decision of the House on the merits or demerits of the accused, or any body else, whose conduct is directly or indirectly implicated in the trial.

Mr. WISE inquired whether, before the Counsel for the accused had concluded their examination, it was in order to move such a resolution without first moving to suspend the rules

The CHAIR said the Counsel for the accused had concluded the examination of witnesses, as he understood.

Mr. WISE submitted it to the Chair and the House, whether this resolution could be in order when there were witnesses on the stand, as it were? The chairman of the committee on the part of the House had called a witness, his honorable colleague, (Mr. Garland,) who was sworn, and had interrogatories propounded to him which he had not yet answered, and the clerk of the committee had not yet been examined. Were these witnesses to be cut off in this way? Was this the spirit of your rule? Was this the justice of the House? And would the Speaker make this decision?

The CHAIR said, that while a witness was on the stand, this resolution would not be in order; but that it would be in order when the witness was off the stand. There was certainly no witness on the stand at the time the resolution was submitted; therefore, he could not do otherwise than entertain it. He had informed the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Mercer) that his motion would be in order so soon as the witness should be removed from the stand. At the stage of the proceeding when the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) had made his motion, the Counsel for the accused had informed the Chair that they had concluded the examination of their witnesses, and there was no motion before the House. Then, certainly, the motion was in order. The Chair then read an extract from the order of the House in support of his decision.

Mr. WISE said he felt constrained to ask the reading of the whole of the order.

The Clerk then read the order of the House as follows:

"Resolved, That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House in relation to his alleged contempt; and that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to examine such witnesses on the part of the House. That the questions put shall be reduced to writing before proposed to the witnesses, and that the answers be also reduced to writing. Every question put by any other than a member of the committee shall be reduced to writing by such member, and be propounded to the witness by the Speaker, if not objected to; but if any question shall be objected to, or any testimony offered shall be objected to, by any member, the member so objecting, and the accused or his counsel, shall be heard, after which the question shall be decided without further debate. If parol evidence is offered, the witnesses shall be sworn by the Speaker, and be examined at the bar, unless they are members of the House, in which case they may be examined in their places."

Mr. WISE would now appeal to the House from the decision of the Chair, to say whether or not this order did not apply to the witnesses to be examined on the part of the committee. This order proposed an examination, not only on the part of the accused, but on the part of the House also.

The CHAIR would call the attention of the House to the construction of the first sentence of this order, which was in the following words: "That Reuben M. Whitney be now permitted to examine witnesses before this House in relation to his alleged contempt; and that a committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to examine such witnesses."

Mr. WISE inquired if it was possible that the House only intended to examine such witnesses as the accused might introduce? Was it possible that the House would sanction this ex parte proceeding? Would the House confirm this decision of the Speaker? He would beg of his friend from Virginia, (Mr. Patton,) whom he knew intended no injustice to him, to withdraw this proposition. The defense set up for the accused was, that he (Mr. W.) was an unsafe person for this individual to appear before. The witnesses of the accused had been heard on this subject, and Mr. W. claimed the privilege of calling witnesses, and having them heard. He called upon the committee, on the part of the House, to have the honorable chairman of the select committee (Mr. Garland) called, who was, by far, the best witness, and let him testify. He witnessed every transaction, and Mr. W. hesitated not to say, witnessed more than any of the witnesses who had testified, because his position was such that he could see more, and he could tell the facts of that scene better than any other witness. It was but justice that the chairman of the committee should be heard, and it was but justice that the clerk of the committee should be called upon to testify in relation to the transaction, and tell what he knew about the matter. When this accused, in his defence, became an accuser, and he (Mr. W.) was put upon his defence, he would appeal to every honorable gentleman on that floor to allow him the opportunity of examining witnesses in his defence, and not justify the accused, and pronounce judgment on him (Mr. W.) by his discharge.

What will be the effect of your resolution to discharge this man? Why it will be passing an indirect judgment on a chairman of a select committee of the House. There was no motion to call this witness before a committee, to testify on oath touching the subject matter of his alleged contempt, but a positive unqualified motion to discharge him. The effect of it would be saying to him that he was guilty of no contempt, and was perfectly justified in the position he assumed in not appearing before a select committee, after being duly summoned to appear. Would you discharge this accused after examining his own witness, without hearing any on the other side? Mr. W. had witnesses he wished to examine, and he trusted he was not to be cut off in this way. He would suggest another thing to the Speaker. This accused, by the order of the House, was to go through with his testimony—not his witnesses, but his testimony. The question in relation to that testimony was the subject before the House. The Counsel of the accused had made an application for certain extracts from the journal of the committee, and whilst that application was pending, and undecided, it could not be in order to entertain a resolution for the unconditional discharge of this accused. If the Chair decided in favor of entertaining this resolution, he would act inconsistently with a former decision. When a member of the committee on the part of the House had submitted a motion, the Speaker decided it to be out of order.

The CHAIR said he had so decided, because there then was another question pending before the House, and undisposed of.

Mr. WISE. What question was pending?

The CHAIR. A motion from the Counsel.

Mr. WISE had understood that a member of the committee had first submitted that proposition, and asked a suspension of the rule thereon, and the House had refused to suspend the rules. Afterwards, when the Chair understood the motion to come from the Counsel, he had entertained it; but until the testimony of the accused was gone through with, the Speaker had refused to entertain any proposition. Now Mr. W. asked if the honorable chairman of the select committee, (Mr. Garland,) was not on the stand, and Mr. W. had interrogatories to propound to him. Mr. W. would call upon the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Thomas,) to say whether this was his understanding of the mode of proceeding under this rule. In all cases of contempt which he (Mr. W.) had witnessed, the accused was first called upon to purge himself of the contempt; and if he did not choose to do that witnesses were called upon to establish the charge; then after they were examined witnesses for the defence were heard. Now, however, all proceedings have been reversed, and you commence first with the witnesses for the defence, and so soon as they are got through with, all testimony is silenced.

The CHAIR explained the grounds of his decision. The question of order was one thing, and the question whether the House would agree to the resolution, was quite a different one. There might be very strong reasons for not agreeing to the resolution, but that did not affect the question of order. The Chair then begged leave to call the attention of the House to the proceedings in this case, and the decisions it had become his duty to make. When the accused was first brought to the bar of the House, and before any witness was put upon the stand, the Chair entertained a motion by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Briggs) as being in order. At a subsequent stage of the proceeding, whilst a witness was on the stand, and an interrogatory propounded to him, and the witness in the act of answering it, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Chambers) moved a proposition, which the Chair decided to be not then in order, for the most obvious reason, that while a witness was on the stand, and a question propounded to him, it was the same as a pending motion, and by every principle of parliamentary law, where there is a pending motion it is not in order to entertain another. That evening, in the confusion of the House, he had made a decision without understanding the facts of the case, as they were afterwards explained. The Chair had understood the Counsel for the accused to have submitted a motion, and then the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Thomas) submitted his motion, which the Chair decided not to be in order without a suspension of the rule, pending the motion of the Counsel. When the gentleman from Virginia, in front of the Chair, (Mr. Mercer,) had attempted to submit a motion, the Chair decided it not then to be in order, because of the pending motion; but the Chair had distinctly informed the gentleman, that whenever the motion before the House was disposed of, his motion would be in order. That question having been disposed of, and there being no motion before the House, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) rose, and submitted his motion. As a question of order, then, the Chair could not refuse to receive it. There might be very good reasons why the House should reject the motion; but, as a question of order, the Chair had not a doubt but that it was in order.

Mr. THOMAS said, when the committee on the part of the House held their first meeting, there was some discussion as to the course they were to pursue under the order of the House, and they came to the determination that they were to wait until after the Counsel for the accused got through with their testimony. This, however, seemed to his mind an extraordinary proceeding, but it became them to reserve all action until the Counsel had got through with their examination. The committee had pursued this course until yesterday, when they summoned the chairman of the select committee, (Mr. Garland,) and propounded to him certain interrogatories, which he understood the witness was now ready to answer. Then, to the mind of Mr. T. this witness was on the stand, and with all due deference to the opinion of the Chair, he considered the witness now under examination. He put it to the House, whether it would be proper to interrupt this investigation at this period. He hoped the investigation might go on, so that those gentlemen whose condoning witnesses in legal form. If the committee could have foreseen that an effort of this kind would have been made, it would have been their solemn duty to have moved a resolution to permit those gentlemen whose conduct was impugned to examine witnesses. He was bound in candor to say, that the committee differed with the Chair as to the construction to put upon the order of the House.

Mr. WISE would call upon the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Thomas) expressly to state, whether the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) did not suggest to the committee that this resolution might be capable of receiving the construction the Speaker had put upon it, and whether it had not been pronounced that it was impossible such a construction should be put upon it. Mr. W. called upon the gentleman to state whether this was not the case.

Mr. THOMAS had no recollection of such a conversation. It might possibly have taken place, but if it had he had no recollection of it. Mr. T. had taken occasion to examine the proceedings in Houston's case, and he had found that the present resolution did not conform to the rule of proceeding in that case.

Mr. LINCOLN said he had stated in the committee that by possibility this construction might be placed on the rule, and it was insisted by gentlemen on the committee that it was impossible such a construction should be put upon it.

Mr. WISE only wished to bring to the notice of the House that the committee had consulted on the subject of this resolution, and they considered it was utterly impossible that such a construction should be placed upon it. Mr. W. was glad that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Thomas) had been candid enough to announce that this construction of the rule did not meet his views. He was glad that the committee could not have contemplated such a course as had been taken. When the honorable chairman of the committee (Mr. Garland) was left off the list of witnesses, Mr. W. thought he saw then that the very moment a certain point was reached in this investigation all proceedings would be stopped. Why was not the honorable chairman on the list of witnesses for the accused? Was it because he had concurred in the statement which he, (Mr. W.) and his friend from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) had made on that floor? Was it because his testimony might not be of the right kind? Was it because his testimony might not be so palatable to the accused as the other witnesses which he had called? If it had been the original design to have allowed him, (Mr. W.) and his friend, (Mr. Peyton,) to call witnesses in their own justification, an attempt was now made to cut it off. Such could not be the design of his colleague, (Mr. Patton.) Mr. W. knew he was above any such intention; he would vouch for him that it was not his design to do injustice to any one. Could it be the intention of the House to wink at this injustice, by sustaining this decision of the Speaker. Mr. W. could not, he would not, believe it, until the majority of that House sanctioned the decision of the Speaker, which was thought to be imposble by a member of the committee on this part of the House. All Mr. W. could now do was to appeal to the justice and magnanimity of the House, and ask gentlemen to allow him the opportunity of calling witnesses in his own defence.

Mr. WISE and Mr. PEYTON then made very earnest appeals to Mr. PATTON to withdraw his proposition, and, among other objections urged by them, referred to the fact that Mr. GARLAND, chairman of the select committee, had not been examined, although all the other members of that committee had been examined by the accused; and they claimed, as an act of justice to them, that the trial should not be arrested just when the evidence of the accused was closed.

Mr. PATTON said he had always contemplated to postpone his motion until opportunity had been afforded to obtain the testimony of the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Garland,) which seemed to be proper, inasmuch as the other members had been examined; and although he thought the whole proceeding wrong, and that the journal had already been encumbered with a great deal of unsequential and improper testimony, yet, as it had been permitted to examine the other members, he had no objection to hearing the testimony of the chairman. He had not the slightest feeling of prejudice or passion towards any person implicated in the trial, and felt himself incapable of assigning any injustice, directly or indirectly, either to the accused or to any other person, in the effort he was making to arrest this unfortunate trial.

He was actuated solely by the overruling force of considerations impelling him to save the public business from being sacrificed, in the prosecution of a trial from which no public benefit could result, however the feelings of individuals might be involved in its continuance. He was, however, willing, and thought it right, that a full account should be given of the occurrences in the select committee; and as his honorable colleague (Mr. Wise) and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) seemed to think the evidence of the chairman (Mr. Garland) desirable and important, he would withdraw his resolution for the present; but he gave notice that he would renew it as soon as the testimony, going to the facts which took place in the select committee, was closed. Coming into the House a few moments ago, and finding that there was a pause in the examination of witnesses, and that some general propositions were making to give a new direction to the trial, and especially a proposition to send the case before a committee of five members, he really thought either that Mr. Garland had been examined, or that the intention to examine him had been abandoned. For these reasons, (said Mr. P.) I withdraw the resolution for the present.

Mr. PEYTON. I want to make a suggestion. Sir, I merely wish to state to the House, that if it will hear the proof we will adduce, and which is necessary to show up all the transactions that have taken place—if the House will hear the truth, as we can prove it by witnesses who saw it, and by those also who were engaged in the after-transactions—if, I say, sir, the House will hear the evidence, we will sit down and not open our mouths to speak. We, sir, ask not to speak. All we want is for this House to hear the whole of the evidence, and I do hope it will not cut off that evidence. I hope gentlemen will not speak, but grant us the privilege of meeting the proof now offered by counter testimony, and we will cheerfully submit ourselves to the judgment of the House, as men and as members.

Mr. MERCER explained that he had offered his resolution with a perfect understanding between himself and his colleague. If there were any further testimony to offer he would not then press it.

Mr. HOWELL here made a motion that the House adjourn, but withdrew it at the solicitation of Mr. THOMAS, for the purpose of enabling that gentleman to move that a subpoena be issued for Samuel Hamilton, clerk of the select committee of which Mr. GARLAND was chairman; which was ordered.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, then asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Henry A. Wise, and the Hon. Balie Peyton be permitted to summon and examine witnesses, to give evidence in their defence in the investigation now pending before this House.

The CHAIR suggested to the gentleman, that the regular mode would be to call upon the House for an order to issue a subpoena for the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. MCKAY asked why it was that the examination of other witnesses was not proceeded in. He understood that the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Garland,) had been subpoenaed at the requisition of the chairman of the committee of examination, and he hoped that gentleman would be called upon the stand.

Mr. GIBBSON. Mr. SPEAKER, if the gentleman had made the motion instead of reflecting upon the committee, which had had arduous duties to perform, it would have been better.

Mr. MCKAY disclaimed having reflected upon the committee, or having had the most distant intention of doing so.

Mr. HOWELL then renewed his motion for an adjournment.

Mr. MCKEON and Mr. MCKAY severally called for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, as it also did to adjourn; the vote, by tellers, being—yeas 60, nays 70.

The question then recurring upon Mr. WHITE'S resolution.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired if it was in order.

The CHAIR said the proposition was one for the House itself to judge of, though he would again suggest that the regular mode would be to apply to the Speaker for subpoenas.

Mr. PARKS was not aware that those two gentlemen were on trial before the House.

The CHAIR remarked that he supposed the gentleman from Kentucky meant, though it was not so expressed in the resolution, that witnesses be summoned to testify on the pending trial.

Mr. WHITE then slightly modified his resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Henry A. Wise and the Hon. Balie Peyton be permitted to summon and examine witnesses in the trial now pending before the House.

Mr. WHITE said he did not rise for the purpose of inflicting a speech upon the House at this late hour of the evening. He knew the patience of the House would not bear a lengthy debate. Were he convinced the House would tolerate protracted discussion, his own sense of duty would not permit him to consume but a very few moments of that time, which every one knew was precious. He had not intended, at the institution of this proceeding, to engage in the debate, either for or against the accused. He had allotted to himself the office of a silent, and, as far as he could control his feelings, an impartial trier. The accused (until the morning he appeared at the bar of this House) was to him personally an entire stranger. He entertained towards him neither prejudice nor enmity. He had heard much touching both his private and public character, discreditable, in a very high degree, to his reputation; yet he was not possessed of facts that would authorize him to enter up a judgment of guilt. He felt more of sympathy and pity towards the accused than of prejudice or anger.

Being one of those who voted for the resolution directing the accused to be brought to the bar of this House, for an alleged contempt, in peremptorily refusing to obey a summons issued by a committee of this House, expressly empowered to send for persons and papers, owing to the reasons given by the respondent, as the ground of his refusal to appear and testify, he determined, from the beginning of the trial, to vote for any and every proposition that was at all consistent with the rules and principles that should govern trials of the kind. In discharge of this determination, he voted for the resolution giving the accused the privilege to summon witnesses, and examine evidence in his defence, before he had been sworn to answer interrogatories, to clear himself of the alleged contempt. He knew at the time this was unusual and irregular. He was well apprized that it was the invariable usage and practice of all judicial tribunals in similar cases, to permit and require the witness in contempt of the mandate of the court, to be first sworn and examined touching the matters of excuse or justification of his disobedience; but, for reasons which he will subsequently mention, he voted for a departure from this well-established rule of procedure. He went one step further: he voted for the broad and clearly irrelevant interrogatory proposed by the Counsel of the respondent, inquiring into the conduct of the Hon. M. A. Wise and the Hon. Balie Peyton, in an affair that transpired before another committee of this House, of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Garland) was chairman. The reasons that prompted him to give these votes he will briefly state. The respondent, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) had each given their statement of the circumstances and facts attending the unfortunate occurrence before the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Garland) was chairman.

The statements of the respondent materially conflicted with the statements of the other two gentlemen. These different versions of the transaction were before the public: they were to be found in every print and journal in the whole country. The matter had excited considerable interest in the public mind.

The judgment of approval or disapproval of acquittal or condemnation, was as various as the different versions. This being the case, he considered it due to all the parties concerned, due to the character of this House, and due to the country, that the true history of the affair should be disclosed. Another reason, he said, that had influenced his mind in voting upon the various propositions as he had, was, that the respondent had addressed a memorial to the House, setting forth his account of the affair, complaining of outrage and violence towards his person, and an infringement of his constitutional rights as a citizen, praying an inquiry into the transaction.

Upon the score of economising time, he deemed it expedient to admit the question, inasmuch as by so doing both matters could be tried in the same investigation. An additional reason that had prompted him to pursue the course he had taken, the desired to give the accused every privilege (either clear or doubtful) that could be claimed, under similar circumstances, by any American citizen.

But at the time he was voting to grant the accused the widest latitude of defence, he had not dreamed he was opening the door for him to introduce testimony assailing the reputation, and casting the foulest imputations upon the conduct and motives, of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise,) and the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton,) charging them with crimes which, if true, should reflect lasting infamy upon their characters; and that, so soon as he had closed his evidence, the trial should terminate, and the House proceed to pronounce judgment of guilt or acquittal, upon a partial hearing of one side, ex-parte testimony, and that too without permitting the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee to examine witnesses in their behalf—the knowing that their conduct would necessarily be involved by the admission of the question, he had supposed a like liberality would be extended to them so soon as the testimony closed upon the part of the respondent; especially as the House had, by their first movement in the progress of the trial permitted the respondent to change his position, and become accuser instead of accused.

He did not conceive it possible there could be two opinions upon this subject in an enlightened body of men: had he entertained the remotest doubt upon the subject, he never would have voted to admit the interrogatory touching the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) or the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Peyton,) without an express agreement, upon the journal, that those gentlemen should be permitted to introduce rebutting testimony. Whilst he was willing and anxious that every privilege that justly belongs to the citizen, under the benign laws of this country, shall be enjoyed by the respondent, he could not consent that the agis of the Constitution should be confined to him exclusively, and that the gentleman from Virginia, and the gentleman from Tennessee, should be denied the common and universal privilege granted to the vilest culprit of the land—the humble privilege of introducing testimony in explanation and defence of their conduct and motives. A privilege consecrated by the blood of ages, and guaranteed as a sacred right to every American citizen, rich or poor, high or low, by the charter of rights, the Constitution of this country.

Sir, should this resolution be rejected, peculiar injustice will be done the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton.) It cannot be seriously contended, by the learned counsel of the accused, that so much of the evidence as consists of details of speeches, declarations, and conduct of the gentleman from Tennessee, (and two-thirds of the testimony received is of this character,) is relevant to the issue now properly in trial before the House.

It is not only necessary to state the facts apparent upon the record of the journal to make this position manifest. The accused, in his plea, no doubt drawn by his learned Counsel, and presented by himself to the House as the grounds of his defence, states that the reasons why he refused to appear before the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) was chairman, are set forth in his letter addressed to said committee. In that letter, which is made a part of the answer or plea of the respondent, by direct reference, the accused uses the following language:

"The affair between Mr. Peyton and myself, which occurred in the presence of another committee, has nothing whatever to do with the committee to which this is addressed, and before whom I am summoned to appear."

And why is this explicit acknowledgment made by the accused, disavowing any connection between his refusal to obey the summons issued from the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) is chairman, and the affair between Mr. Peyton and himself before another committee? For the most obvious of all reasons—because the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Peyton) was not a member of the committee before whom the respondent was summoned to appear. Yet, in the face of this clear and express disclaimer, set forth in the pleadings of the accused, without notice, without information, the very affair between Mr. Peyton and the respondent, notwithstanding the direct admission in the pleadings of its irrelevancy and illegality, is called for in the very first interrogatory propounded by the Counsel for the accused, whilst there is no rule of evidence better settled than that it is not necessary to prove that which is agreed upon by the pleadings: the correlative rule is equally well settled, that you cannot disprove the admissions of the parties in the pleadings on the record.

And now is this House about solemnly to refuse the adoption of this resolution, after it has unjustly and illegally made the gentleman from Tennessee a party to this trial—after having set day after day, and night after night, hearing testimony charging him with almost every offence known in the black catalogue of crime, shall we deny him the privilege of exculpating himself from the charges? Shall we illegally arraign the gentleman from Tennessee at the bar of this House, (for disguise it as you will, no one who has been present can with any candor deny the fact, that this proceeding, from its very outset, has been a prosecution of the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee,) and listen to accusation upon accusation, charge upon charge, and proof upon proof, against them, and the moment the testimony is closed upon the part of the nominal criminal, (the true plaintiff in this trial, as it has been conducted,) terminate the investigation? Is this justice? Is it fair play? Is it not oppression and tyranny in their most odious form—a palpable denial of justice in the very teeth of your bill of rights—a mockery of trial before this grand inquest of the nation. An act of injustice that would disgrace the poorest court in the pettiest village in this country. And what adds insult to injustice, every word of this evidence is reduced to writing, and is to go out to the people as a fair and impartial expose of the conduct of the relative parties implicated in the pending controversy. And is this one-sided, ex-parte proceeding what gentlemen call a fair investigation? Is this the kind of investigation from which we have been told innocence has nothing to fear? Is it true that before a jury of honest, impartial triers, with liberty of proof, innocence has nothing to fear. But he has learned but little either from observation or reading, who has not discovered that conscious innocence, though a consoling approbation to the accused, is not always a protecting shield against the unrighteous judgment of the world, nor a safe guaranty against ignominious punishment. Daily occurrences around us furnish abundant testimony of this assertion. History, both modern and ancient, is pregnant with examples. Sydney and Emmet perished upon the scaffold as an atonement for their love of liberty and love of country; Phocion and Socrates were doomed to drink the poisonous hemlock as an expiation for their superior virtues; all of whom were allowed the form of trial. But in this case, if this resolution be rejected, we shall deny both the form and substance of trial to the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Virginia. But it is equally due to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) that he should be permitted to introduce proof. His conduct and motives have been directly assailed by the testimony of the accused. The very gist of his defence is based upon the alleged misconduct of the gentleman from Virginia. It is essential to the fair ascertainment of the truth of the plea of the respondent, the validity of his justification, as well as an act of sheer justice to the gentleman from Virginia, that leave should be given him to rebut the testimony of the accused. The entire excuse set forth by the respondent in his answer, is the alleged apprehension of outrage and violence from the gentleman from Virginia, and in support of the respondent's plea, and as a just and valid reason for this apprehension, proof has been received by this House, detailing the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia before the committee of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Garland) is chairman; in which affair great outrage and violence is charged, and assassin-like motives imputed; and is he to be denied the privileges of meeting these charges, and of vindicating his conduct and his motives before this House and the nation, when, too, the testimony would bear directly upon the question in issue, would lead to a fair ascertainment of the truth of the defence set up in avoidance of the alleged contempt by the accused in his answer?

This House has, with great patience and unbounded liberality, heard the testimony of the accused, and is it not now due to truth, to justice, and the assailed reputation of the gentleman from Virginia, that his testimony should be heard in reply? Can we, as impartial triers in this case, come to a just conclusion, whether or not the answer of the gentleman from Virginia is not upon trial—no judgment is asked against him—no punishment is proposed to be inflicted upon him. That neither his life or liberty is in jeopardy true. But is not his reputation, which is infinitely dearer to him than either life or liberty, upon trial? Is not this nation anxiously looking to this investigation, and peering for a publication of the evidence in this case? And will not public opinion either approve of his conduct from the published evidence, or consign his character to infamy? and will this House be guilty of the crying injustice of consigning him to ignominy, without the opportunity of a fair and impartial trial?

If there be any man above all others in the nation, who ought to feel indignant sensibility, and rise in his place, and with uplifted hands protest against such a course of proceeding, it is the individual at the bar of this House, (Mr. Whitney.) A blot has been inflicted upon his reputation, by a collateral investigation, before a committee of this House, upon a former occasion, in which he was denied the privilege of introducing rebutting proof, that neither time nor good conduct can ever remove. That investigation has affixed the seal of infamy upon his character, whether just or unjust, that neither the bedewing tears of pitying angels can ever wash out, nor can the fiery fingers of the fiends of hell ever erase it. There it will remain, so long as his name is held in remembrance.

Sir, I am rejoiced to hear the respondent, through his Coun-set, disapprove a rejection of the resolution under consideration. Let him be what he may, this act is creditable to his heart. But it is objected by an honorable gentleman upon my right, that the press of public business, and the short period of time from this until the adjournment, will not permit the investigation to go on. This objection comes too late; we have gone into the trial by our own action. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), did not refer this matter to the House; he refused in committee to vote upon the matter; he has not asked nor voted for the institution of this trial; he openly disclaims having any agency in the prosecution of the accused. All he asks, is the poor privilege, since he has, by your mode of trial, become the defendant, the real criminal at the bar of this House, (if there be any such character, in truth, a party to this most anomalous proceeding,) of confronting his accusers with proof, of repelling the foul imputations cast upon his conduct and his motives, by the testimony of disinterested witnesses. Will you, can you, after what you have done, deny it to him? Will you, after you have arraigned him before this House as an assassin in motive, if not in deed, and heard witnesses, day after day, in support of the charge, in the presence of thousands of listening spectators, collected from all quarters of this wide-spread nation, the very instant the testimony against him is through, close the trial upon him, without the liberty of defence? Will this House be guilty of an act so pregnant with injustice, offering as an excuse that time could not be spared for further investigation? A cold excuse to a wounded soul. I ask the members who intend to vote against this resolution, what apology they expect to render, satisfactory to their constituents, for such a flagrant act of injustice? Permit me to suppose a dialogue between a member who shall vote in the negative and an honest constituent. "You voted to bring Reuben M. Whitney to the bar of the House to be tried for an alleged contempt?" "Yes." "You voted to give him leave to summons and examine witnesses in his defence, and to be heard by counsel as well as by himself?" "Yes." "You voted to receive the question propounded by the Counsel of the accused, inquiring into the conduct of Messrs. Wise and Peyton in the affair which took place in committee of which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Garland) was chairman?" "Yes." "You patiently sat and heard testimony charging Messrs. Wise and Peyton with using personal outrage and violence towards the accused, and motives of assassination upon the part of Mr. Wise?" "Yes." "And when the accused had examined all the witnesses he desired, you then permitted Messrs. Wise and Peyton the privilege of examining witnesses, in explanation, contradiction, and rebuttal of the testimony introduced upon the part of the accused?" "Oh! no." "And this you call a fair and impartial trial by the House of Congress, the people's House? This is what you mean by equal rights and equal privileges under the Constitution? This is what you call protecting the just rights of an American citizen?" The honest constituent would grow warmer and warmer, until he would indignantly pronounce the curse, "Depart from me thou unworthy servant." And, in my cool and deliberate judgment, if there be any district in any State in this Union that would approbate such a course, it deserves to have the vengeance of Heaven invoked upon it, and the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah should await it.

He said, before he took his seat, he would ask the yeas and nays upon this resolution? He wished it to appear now, and in all future time, how he and how others voted upon this proposition. Did he say in all future time? Yes; in all time to come, unless some political assassin of the Constitution should rise in his place, (backed by a majority of pliant minions,) and obliterate the journal by the modern process of expunction.

Mr. MANN of New York remarked, in reply, that the gentleman from Kentucky was again endeavoring to bring before the House another issue, which the House had repeatedly refused to go into. It was not the first time gentlemen had risen there, and with great solemnity, and doubtless sincerity, too, insisted that there was a different issue than that of whether the accused, then standing at the bar, had been guilty of a contempt or not—a task Mr. M. looked upon as entirely gratuitous on their part. Let him ask those honorable members—let him ask the House, too—to say candidly what was the true issue. Were those two honorable members referred to in reality upon trial there? If they were, what was the accusation? What was the charge against them? Above all, let him ask the members of that House, the gentlemen from Kentucky among the number, what would it be compelled to try? If the House should be called upon to try those gentlemen, it would necessarily be compelled to give a decision of some sort or other, and what decision could they arrive at? If they should be thereafter asked for what those gentlemen had been arraigned and put upon their trial, what answer could be given? None. They formed no part of the pending issue.

Mr. M. was aware, he said, that in the necessary inquiry pending in regard to the contempt alleged against the accused, the conduct of those two gentlemen must be more or less brought out, but in order to ascertain what? Why, in order to ascertain whether the accused had rendered such an excuse as to purge himself of the contempt with which he was charged; but he hoped the House would not suffer itself to be dragged into an examination where no one could tell where this oft renewed proposition.

Mr. GHOLSON wished to say a word or two on behalf of the committee of examination. He had heard, with regret, what he conceived to be insinuations thrown out against the committee, which had done every thing in its power, but had not even yet been permitted to carry out their measures. Resolution after resolution had been submitted, speech after speech had been made, all indirectly to be sure, reflecting upon the committee. One gentleman had asked why subpoenas had not been issued? The answer was at hand; it was because gentlemen did not give them an opportunity. No longer ago than yesterday it was announced on the floor that they were ready to issue or call for subpoenas for any witnesses; and now the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. White,) after an announcement to him, that he (Mr. G.) would have any witnesses subpoenaed whose names should be given to him, either for the member from Virginia, or for the member from Tennessee, to prove their accusations against the prisoner at the bar, yet still this resolution is introduced as if the committee had failed in the discharge of their duty, and had refused or denied any opportunity for witnesses to be summoned. The committee had not failed to do all in their power; and he hoped, before gentlemen proceeded any further, they would at least give them the opportunity of doing their duty, and not step out of their way to make inquiries why so and so had not been done. The committee had had, as yet, no opportunity to bring testimony before the House, but still they had held themselves at all times, as they still did, willing to bring in any witnesses who might be called for, if permitted to do so. The will was with them—the power with the House; but he hoped to hear no more of those indirect side-wind censures upon the committee.

Mr. BELL remarked, that after what had been said by the gentleman from Mississippi of the views of that committee, he should not delay the House one moment on that subject. But that gentleman and every other member must perceive, that there was a disposition among a large portion of the House not to permit the whole of the inquiry to proceed.

They had just heard that the committee appointed to conduct the examination on the part of the House were ready to go into it; and although the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky was not worded in the manner he preferred, yet there was no time more proper than that to settle the question definitively, whether it was the sense of the House that they should proceed any further or not. That resolution was best adapted to test the sense of the House, and therefore he hoped the question would be taken on it. If it should be voted down, it would show an indisposition to go further in the inquiry, and that question had better be settled at once.

The gentleman from New York over the way (Mr. Mann) had said that there was no issue formed with the two gentlemen referred to. Mr. B. replied, that the only issue formed at all, had been the issue on the part of the House against those gentlemen, or rather on the part of those gentlemen who conducted the examination on the part of the accused, against his honorable friend from Virginia, and his honorable colleague. It was evident that this had been the issue. The mere form of proceeding, perhaps, was an issue with the accused, Mr. Whitney, but it was in form only, the other was the substance.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Patton) had said that he proposed to cut short this examination, as Mr. B. understood him, and that he had foreseen from the first, when the subject was first brought to the notice of the House, that this examination or trial, if gone into, would take the direction it had, and necessarily involve the very inquiry that had been gone into. Mr. B. said he should like the gentleman to say, if he saw the result before the bringing of Mr. Whitney to the bar of the House, and how he arrived at that conclusion?

Mr. PATTON explained that, from the nature of the trial itself, he saw it would be extended to an almost interminable length, from its irritating and personal character.

Mr. BELL did not mean to imply that the gentleman had foreseen any of the results that had occurred upon the motion to bring Whitney to the bar of the House, from any information he had of the determination on the part of the majority in relation to the course they designed to pursue; but it seemed the gentleman inferred that what had taken place was probable, from the disposition which existed, or which might have existed, in this particular case, or in any case. Now, Mr. B. would ask, why should any gentleman have foreseen this? How had it happened that any gentleman in that House, or in the country at large, should have had such apprehensions? Here was a party arraigned for contempt as a witness. Why, it was no great enormity, nor did it amount even to a criminal offence of a high denomination, and certainly did not require all the array of learned counsel; and who could have anticipated such a course of proceeding as had ensued? What ought to have been the question before that honorable House? and what must ever be the similar question in all cases of the same kind? The party was arraigned at the bar, and was solemnly asked, standing at the bar, whether he had intentionally committed a contempt of that House? That was the substance of the interrogatory. Why that course had been departed from in the present case, was for those to say who had induced that departure.

An argument had been thrown out that, if this resolution should be adopted, it would occupy the time of the House from then till the 4th of March, the close of their constitutional existence. And how? It was because the majority, in the first instance, did not proceed according to the known forms. It was because that House had thought proper, by a majority of votes, to sanction a proceeding not only unknown to parliamentary history, but in notorious disregard to, and in direct violation of, it. There was no issue, even with Mr. Whitney; there could be none until he was put to answer interrogatories to purge himself of the alleged contempt. Mr. B. would again ask how it happened that gentlemen get up on that floor, and say "this trial must occupy the balance of the session," when they must know the responsibility rests with themselves? when they ought to reflect that it was because the majority determined to proceed in a mode unknown to the law, and a direct trampling upon not only precedent, but reason. What, sir, (said Mr. B.) have a formal array of the Counsel of a witness at first, and suffer them to proceed before you form an issue with him, or before you ascertain whether he is really in earnest, or not? Such a thing was never heard of before.

Now, sir, (concluded Mr. B.) as I am up, let me say to gentlemen, as suggested to my mind, that justice, reason, common sense, propriety, all, all require that, as we have commenced thus irregularly, and have implicated other gentlemen whom it was not necessary to have implicated, we must go through with it, or, at least, with the examination of witnesses. We are bound, in common justice and honor, to give them that privilege.

Mr. WISE could not be considered as a prosecutor in this case; all he desired was that he might be permitted to defend himself.

Mr. BELL did not wish to name any gentleman in the suggestion he had made, but simply to have an expression of the House that this trial should proceed as long as there was a witness whom any gentleman might wish to examine.

Mr. McKEON would suggest that any gentleman who might wish to introduce witnesses in this case, could effect their object their object by sending in their names to the committee on the part of the House, whose duty it was to summon and examine witnesses.

Mr. WISE could not do so; not, however, out of any disrespect to the committee, but because, as he understood, that committee was appointed to prosecute in the case; and he could not be considered as an aider or abettor in this prosecution. He only asked the privilege of defending himself. The individual called the accused had, through his Counsel, in the course of the whole trial, been bringing accusations against Mr. W. and when you talk of the accused, he could not tell whether you meant him (Mr. Wise) or the individual at the bar.

Mr. McKEON then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 78, nays 50, as follows:

Ash, Barton, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Bovee, Brown, Buchanan, Bynum, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Cramer, Cray, Cushman, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Effner, Fry, Gholson, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Holt, Huntington, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, William Mason, Moses Mason, McKay, McKee, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Page, Parks, Dutee J. So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, then moved that the House adjourn: lost—yeas 50, nays 79.

The honorable JAMES GARLAND of Virginia, was then called on the stand.

TESTIMONY OF THE HONORABLE JAMES GARLAND OF VIRGINIA.

First question by the COUNSEL for the accused.—Please state all the circumstances attending the dispute and disorder that occurred before the select committee, whereof Mr. Garland is chairman, on Wednesday, the 25th of January, and state particularly all that was said and done by, and the whole demeanor and conduct of, R. M. Whitney, as a witness attending the committee, and Messrs. Wise and Peyton, as members of that committee, and all that occurred on that occasion.

Answer.—The transaction now investigating, took place on the night of the 25th day of January last. Mr. Peyton had, without objection by the committee, proposed to Mr. Whitney the following interrogatory: "Did you receive any letter of recommendation from R. B. Tanev, or did he, in any manner, countenance you in applying for the agency contemplated; or did he positively refuse to recommend, receive, for countenance you in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department?" which, I, as chairman propounded. To this interrogatory Mr. Whitney returned the following answer:

"I decline answering this interrogatory, more particularly as the individual propounding it has asserted, positively and publicly, that the substance of the latter part of it is true, beginning with 'or did he' &c.; therefore, being the party accused, I am not a proper witness. I think, in justice, that the individual who has made the allegation should be called to produce his proof."

After I had sent the answer to the committee, Mr. Peyton in a tone and manner indicating strong excitement, remarked, "Mr. Chairman: I wish you distinctly to inform this witness, that he is not to insult me in his answers; then rising from his seat, and approaching Mr. Whitney, said, as well as I can recollect, 'I will not be insulted to my face by any damned thief, and damned robber; and if you dare to insult me here to my face, God damn you, I will put you to death on the spot.' You say in your card that I seek protection under my constitutional privileges, but I will let you know that I do not claim any constitutional privilege to protect me against an insult to my face, here or elsewhere." Before Mr. Peyton had finished this sentence, Mr. Wise rose from his seat, which was on the sofa, on the side of the room opposite Mr. Whitney, and walked about half way across, saying, "yes, the committee had borne the damned insolence of that witness long enough; it was insufferable." Mr. Peyton remarked, "Wise, this is my business, don't you interfere." I immediately rose, and said to Mr. Wise, "Wise, don't do so, you are wrong." Upon which Mr. Wise immediately returned to his seat. When Mr. Wise turned to resume his seat, I immediately turned to Mr. Peyton, and remarked: "Mr. Peyton you must observe the order of the committee." Mr. Peyton immediately turned from the witness to me, and said, as near as I can recollect, "Mr. Chairman, I appeal to you to say if I have not treated this witness, from the beginning, as if he were a gentleman, but I'll be damned if I will be insulted to my face." He then took his seat in the chair which I had occupied, as I had taken the chair which he had risen from. After Mr. Peyton and myself were both seated, Mr. Whitney rose from his seat, and advancing one or two steps towards me, said, "Mr. Chairman," uttering two or three other words which I did not hear. Before he had finished his sentence Mr. Peyton rose up and said, as well as I recollect, "He has no right to speak here; God damn him, he shan't speak; he must give his answers in writing." Then turning towards Mr. Whitney, said, "You have no right to speak here; sit down, sir." I remarked to Mr. Peyton that the witness had a right to make a question touching his examination; but before I finished the remark, Mr. Peyton, very much excited, said, "Damn him, I have treated him as if he were a gentleman." I again remarked to Mr. Peyton that he must observe order. Mr. Whitney, who had not taken his seat, said, "Mr. Chairman, I came here under the summons of the committee. I claim its protection." Mr. Peyton said, "Damn him, he has insulted me to my face; damn him, he looks at me: he shan't look at me." As he made this remark, appearing very angry, he put his right hand either to his bosom or the side pocket of his coat. As soon as he put his hand to his bosom, Mr. Wise sprang forward, seized Mr. Peyton by the breast, and said, "Peyton, don't notice him; damn him, he is not worthy of your notice," and some other expression, which I do not remember. Mr. Peyton remarked, "I will notice him; I would notice him if he were a damned dog, if he insulted me to my face." As soon of Mr. Wise seized hold of Mr. Peyton, I stepped between him and Mr. Whitney, and Mr. Martin took hold of his right arm. Mr. Wise shoved Mr. Peyton back some two or three steps towards the sofa, Mr. Peyton endeavoring somewhat to disengage himself from Mr. Wise and Mr. Martin, but failed. About this time some member of the committee made a motion to suspend the examination, and Mr. Hamer made some remarks, which I did not hear, for my attention was directed to the parties, with a view, if necessary, to prevent collision by personal interposition. At this time I remarked to Mr. Whitney, "that a question would arise as to the disposition of his answer, and that he would be pleased to retire, which he did. After Mr. Whitney retired, Mr. Peyton, who had been very much excited, became more tranquil; expressed his regret for the occurrence; urged, in extenuation, the insult which he had received in the answer referred to, and the contemptuous look and scowl with which it was accompanied, as the cause of his great excitement, and apologized to the committee, promising that thereafter he would try and suppress his feelings, unless grossly and directly insulted. Mr. Hamer then submitted the following motion:

"That the answer to the 15th question be returned to the witness, being no reply to the interrogatory, and disrespectful to a member of the committee;" which was unanimously adopted. Mr. Wise then called me to him near the window, and remarked that, "in Mr. Peyton's present state of feeling, it would not do to permit him and Mr. Whitney to go out of the room together; if they did, he would not be responsible for the consequences; that it would be best to call back the witness—permit Mr. Peyton to ask him another question, which would greatly tend to tranquillize him, and then discharge the witness without the committee's adjourning. I told him I approved of the plan; that there was some unfinished business before the committee, which I would call up when Mr. Whitney was discharged; and that he must see that Mr. Peyton did not leave the room; which he promised he would do. The witness was then called in, and the resolution of the committee read to him. After it was read, he said, as well as I recollect, "If I have been disrespectful to the committee, I regret it, and apologize for it." Mr. Peyton then propounded a question, which Mr. Whitney answered in a respectful manner, and was discharged. As Mr. Whitney left the room, I called some unfinished business to the attention of the committee, which detained it about ten minutes, and then it adjourned. In this narrative, I am guided by my memory alone. I have given the circumstances which occurred, and the language which was employed, as accurately as a treacherous memory will permit. I do not profess entire accuracy, nor to have stated all that occurred.

Second question by COUNSEL.—What was Mr. Whitney's general demeanor as a witness before the committee; was any indiscretion or disrespect on his part towards the committee, or any member of it, observed or complained of, or in any manner censured by the committee?

Answer.—Mr. Whitney's general personal demeanor before the committee, so far as it came under my observation, was unexceptionable. The answer referred to by Mr. Martin, taken in connection with some preceding answers, I thought not respectful to the committee. I concur with Mr. Martin's statement upon that subject, in his answer to the interrogatory.

Third question by COUNSEL.—Please state whether the conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the whole of the unhappy scene in question, was or was not cool, collected, and forbearing; whether he did, or did not, manifest by word, deed, or gesture, and by what word, deed, or gesture, any disposition to assault Mr. Peyton. Please describe such circumstances of his posture and manner, as may go to show whether he meditated assault, or stood on the defensive merely.

Answer.—The conduct of Mr. Whitney, throughout the occurrence, so far as I observed it, was cool, deliberate, and perhaps forbearing. I do not remember to have seen any word, deed, or gesture which indicated a design on the part of Mr. Whitney to commit violence on Mr. Peyton. As to Mr. Whitney's posture, I can say no more than that it was erect, and his eyes directed to Mr. Peyton when I saw him. My attention was principally directed to Mr. Peyton.

First question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not Mr. Wise endeavor to prevent any collision between Mr. Peyton and R. M. Whitney, by slipping in between them, and laying his hands upon Mr. Peyton, and pushing him back from his position?

Answer.—I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory, that when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, Mr. Wise immediately seized him by the bosom; in doing so, he was placed between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney.

Second question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise privately request the members of the committee not to rise until after a sufficient time was allowed after the examination of R. M. Whitney was closed to enable him (Whitney) to withdraw from the committee room, so as to prevent the witness and Mr. Peyton being thrown together, without the presence of the committee to restrain them? and did not Mr. Wise, at the time, declare that his object was to prevent collision between the parties?

Answer.—I have also stated in the same answer, that Mr. Wise did request me to aid in detaining the committee after Mr. Whitney was discharged, to prevent him and Mr. Peyton being thrown together out of the committee room; he also stated to me that he made the same request of Mr. Hamer, and perhaps others.

Third question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did Mr. Wise do more than denounce the insolence of R. M. Whitney to the committee? And, in attempting to pacify Mr. Peyton, did he do more than say to him that R. M. Whitney was not worth his notice?

Answer.—In the same answer I have also stated every thing I recollect Mr. Wise to have said.

Fourth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Did, or did not, Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton treat R. M. Whitney with perfect respect in his examination before the committee, both before and after the difficulty between him and Mr. Peyton had occurred; and did not his examination occupy much time; and were not most of the questions propounded by Mr. Peyton after the difficulty occurred?

Answer.—The personal demeanor of Messrs. Wise and Peyton, towards Mr. Whitney, so far as it came under my observation during his whole examination, was entirely respectful, except upon this occasion, both before and after this occurrence. Mr. Whitney's examination occupied much time.

Fifth question by Mr. CALHOON of Kentucky.—Had you, or had you not, seen Mr. Whitney's card in the Globe of the 5th of January last?

[This card was given in Mr. Fairfield's testimony.] And do you not know or believe that Mr. Peyton had seen said card, or was informed of its contents? and did not the answer to the question which preceded the difficulty, involve the truth of the charges which the card of Mr. Whitney pronounced to be false, and for the uttering of which he pronounced Mr. Peyton a calumniator?

Answer.—I had seen Mr. Whitney's "card," published in the Globe of the 5th of January last. I know Mr. Peyton had seen it, because I had heard him speak of it before this occurrence. I thought the reference of the answer to that "card," is what constituted the offensive character of the answer. Apart from the card I should not have thought the answer of itself offensive.

First question of Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did R. M. Whitney use immediately before the interposition of Mr. Peyton?

Answer.—I have stated in my answer to the first interrogatory, all that I heard Mr. Whitney say. If he said any thing more I do not recollect it.

Second question by Mr. INGERSOLL.—What language did Mr. R. M. Whitney use immediately before the witness says, "Mr. Peyton rose and addressed the chairman?"

Answer.—I have already stated all that I heard Mr. Whitney say; if he said any thing more I do not recollect it.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remarks made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—When I first called Mr. Peyton to order, after stating that he appealed to me to say whether he had not throughout the examination treated Mr. Whitney as a gentleman, he took his seat.

Second question of Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, did he advance across a line drawn from his chair towards the fireplace, cutting him off from R. M. Whitney? Could you, at the instant of time when Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, see the right hand of Mr. Whitney? If yes, was it not thrust into his pocket, with the left foot advanced?

Answer.—When Mr. Peyton rose the second time, he rose from the seat which I had previously occupied. He did advance beyond a line drawn from that seat to the fireplace, but not beyond such a line from the seat which he had previously occupied. At the instant of time that Mr. Peyton put his hand to his bosom, Mr. Wise, in getting to Mr. Peyton, passed between me and Mr. Whitney. I also immediately got between Mr. Peyton and Mr. Whitney, with my eyes upon Mr. Peyton, so that I had no opportunity to see whether Mr. Whitney had his hand in his pocket, or stood with one foot advanced.

Third question of Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, R. M. Whitney, which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—At the time Mr. Peyton complained of the offensive look being given, my back was turned upon Mr. Whitney, and my eyes directed to the clerk. I did not see the offensive look. I heard Mr. Peyton complain of it in a short time after the difficulty arose, but cannot fix the time with certainty.

Fourth question of Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—I have already stated that I heard Mr. Peyton complain that Mr. Whitney had given him an offensive look, when the answer which gave rise to the difficulty was handed to me. The exact time Mr. Peyton complained I do not remember.

Fifth question of Mr. BELL.—If it had been Mr. Peyton's intention to draw a weapon upon Mr. Whitney, had he not ample time to do so?

Answer.—Mr. Peyton had an opportunity, when he first rose, to have drawn a weapon, and have used it, before he could have been arrested. He was about four feet off Mr. Whitney, and nearer to him than any member of the committee.

Sixth question of Mr. BELL.—What number of interrogatories were propounded by Mr. Peyton to the witness, R. M. Whitney? How many before, and how many after the question and answer which gave rise to the altercation alluded to? Did you apprehend danger of insult or personal violence to said witness, when he reappeared before said committee, on the part of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Peyton? State whether they and each of them, did not treat him with the courtesy due a witness, as well after, as before that occurrence?

Answer.—Mr. Fairfield has correctly stated the number of questions propounded, both before and after this occurrence; during which time Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton were entirely respectful in their demeanor to Mr. Whitney. I at no time apprehended an insult or violence, except on the occasion now under investigation, either before or after.

Seventh question of Mr. BELL.—Was there not a rule of the committee that all questions should be reduced to writing, and propounded through the chairman to witness, if not objected to by a member of the committee; and that all answers of witness should be returned in writing through the same channel? and was it not remarked by Mr. Peyton, that the witness must answer in writing, and that he should not address the committee in any other way?

Answer.—There was such a rule, and Mr. Peyton did say the witness must answer in writing.

Eighth question of Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not said witness refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one above alluded to, characterizing them as inquisitorial, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—The journal of the committee shows that fact. The questions which were propounded, and which Mr. Whitney declined answering, are all recorded.

First question by COMMITTEES.—Was or was not, the deportment of Mr. Peyton, that of a man who did not intend to make an attack, but desired to deter another, and make him desist from insulting remark and conduct?

Answer.—I have detailed to the House all of Mr. Peyton's language and deportment upon that occasion, which I recollect; I do not know what Mr. Peyton's motives were, and am, therefore, unwilling to express an opinion concerning them.

Second question by COMMITTEE.—What was the question put to Mr. Whitney and his answer thereto, to which you refer in your answer to the first interrogatory, and what was the vote of the committee also referred to by you in your answer to the same interrogatory, and will you now set them forth to be received in connection with, and as part of your answer to said interrogatory?

Answer.—I have incorporated the question, answer and resolution referred to, in my answer to the first interrogatory.

Question by Mr. BELL.—When Mr. Peyton was called to order by the chairman of the committee for the first remark made by him in reference to Mr. Whitney, did he not take his seat, and continue sitting until Mr. Whitney rose and commenced speaking?

Answer.—I have fully answered this question in my answer to the interrogatory.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did you occupy a position which enabled you to see the offensive look or scowl of the witness, (R. M. Whitney,) which he cast upon Mr. Peyton, if any, at the time of his handing his answer to the chairman?

Answer.—I have heretofore stated that I did not.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton complain that the witness, R. M. Whitney, had insulted him by his look at the time?

Answer.—I have heretofore stated that I heard Mr. Peyton make this complaint.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Have you, or any other persons to your knowledge, had any conversation with the said R. M. Whitney, since the occurrence in the committee. If so, did he inform you then that he was alarmed, and that his fears had induced him to take the course which he has done in this matter? State all he said in relation to his fears, or the motives which induced his course upon this occasion.

Answer.—I have had no conversation whatever with Mr. Whitney upon this subject, nor does it come within my knowledge that any other person has.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Had, or had not, said witness, R. M. Whitney, refused to answer several questions put to him by Mr. Peyton, before the one alluded to, characterizing them as inquisitorial, which questions had been decided by the committee as proper to be propounded?

Answer.—I have heretofore referred to the journal of the committee, as affirming this fact. Some of the questions which the witness refused to answer were decided by the committee to be proper; others were propounded without objection being made, leaving the witness to answer or object, as he might think best.

Question by Mr. PEYTON.—When did you first see the written statement of Mr. Fairfield, which he presented to this House, in answer to the first interrogatory propounded to him, or the substance of the same?

Answer.—In the committee room, on the morning after you and Mr. Wise made your statements in the House.

Question by the COUNSEL.—Did Mr. Wise at any time, and when and where, state what was his purpose in going around the table, and placing himself near the accused, as stated in your answer to the first interrogatory? If yes, what did he say was his purpose? And was the statement of Mr. Wise as to his purpose in that movement, before or after the accused's testimony before the committee had been closed?

Answer.—I do not remember seeing Mr. Wise go around the table to the north end of it. I remember to have seen him there a second or two before he seized hold of Mr. Peyton. I did not hear him make any declaration of his purpose that night; his personal exertions that night were to prevent violence. The declaration of his purpose, as stated by himself, I never heard until after Mr. Whitney's card, giving an account of the transaction, appeared. I heard him state in the committee room substantially what he stated in the House, as to his purpose. I do not distinctly recollect his language upon either occasion. I understood him to say, upon both occasions, that he had gone around the table, seeing Mr. Whitney with his right hand in his pocket; and, believing him to be armed with a deadly weapon, he intended to watch him, and if he drew, or attempted to draw, a weapon, so that the life of his friend was endangered, that Mr. Whitney should have died. In the House he said he wished not to be misunderstood or to be misrepresented; that if Mr. Whitney had drawn a weapon, it never should have done his execution.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Do the accompanying interrogatories and answers contain all the evidence given by Chief Justice TANEY, under the authority of the select committee of which you are chairman? and is not the copy of a letter, purporting to be from Chief Justice TANEY to Reverdy Johnson, Esq. herewith furnished, a copy of a letter given in evidence by said Johnson?

Interrogatories propounded to Chief Justice TANEY.

1. In the letter of R. M. Whitney to Mr. Wm. J. Duane, then Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date 15th June, 1833, applying to be appointed agent of the Department, or of the deposit banks, when the public money should be removed from the Bank of the United States, he makes the following statement, to wit: "I have never spoken to the President upon this subject; but circumstances lead me to think that I should not be otherwise than perfectly acceptable to him. The only persons to whom I have mentioned the subject, connected with Government, are Messrs. Taney and Kendall; to the former gentleman a week since, at Baltimore, who replied in these words: 'I have always understood, and taken it for granted, that you were to have the situation when it is created.' " I wish you to state whether the above extract from said Whitney's letter is true, so far as relates to yourself.

2. Did you give said R. M. Whitney a letter of recommendation; or did you in any manner countenance or encourage him in applying for the agency referred to; or did you refuse to recommend or countenance him in that capacity while you were at the head of the Treasury Department?

3. State whether you, as Secretary of the Treasury, approved or disapproved the plan or scheme, as set forth in letter exhibit A, in Woodbury's report. What part, if any, did R. M. Whitney take in the success of that measure? Who originated it, so far as you know, and it would be proper for you to state? Did or did not Mr. Amos Kendall know of the existence of that project while he was acting as the agent of the Treasury in the summer of 1833? Did he approve or disapprove of the same, so far as you know?

4. Did you, or did you not, oppose the application made by Mr. R. M. Whitney to the Union Bank, or deposit bank at Baltimore, to join other banks in recommending him to the Secretary of the Treasury for the station referred to in exhibit A of Woodbury's report?

5. State what you know under the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved. That a committee of nine members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire whether the several banks employed for the deposit of the public money have all, or any of them, by joint or several contract, employed an agent to reside at the seat of Government, to transact their business with the Treasury Department; what is the character of the business which he is so employed to transact, and what compensation he receives; whether said agent, if there be one, has been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of the Treasury Department; whether the business of Treasury Department with said banks is conducted through said agent; and whether in the transaction of any business confided to said agent, he receives any compensation from the Treasury Department; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Answer of R. B. Taney to the interrogatories propounded to him.

1. To the first interrogatory I answer, that the statement in relation to myself in the extract given in this interrogatory, from the letter of R. M. Whitney to W. J. Duane, of June 15, 1833, is not correct. I recollect very well that, in the spring of that year, while the subject of removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States was under consideration, doubts were suggested whether the State banks would not be found incompetent to discharge the duties of fiscal agents, and to meet the necessities of commerce in the business of domestic exchange, by reason of their want of acquaintance with the ordinary operations of the Treasury Department, in the transfer and disbursements of the public money, and from the want of arrangement with one another, so as to accommodate the Government and the public; and that I then entertained and often expressed the opinion, that the inconveniences would very probably be felt by the State banks, especially in the commencement of the business, but that they would be surmounted if the banks would choose to appoint an agent or agents to reside at Washington, to communicate to them, from time to time, such information as they might stand in need of; and that I thought that the banks which might be selected as depositories, where large amounts of revenue were collected, and which would have large transfers and disbursements to make, would probably find it for their interest to have such an agent.

In conversing with the said Whitney, about the time above stated, upon this subject, he mentioned that he would like to be the agent for the banks, and that he thought he could make himself useful to them.

In reply, I stated, that from his knowledge of banks and exchange, I believed he would be able to render them valuable services, and that from his qualifications he might succeed in obtaining the appointment he spoke of, if the banks should find it necessary to have such an agent. This, I presume, is the conversation referred to in the letter of the said Whitney, mentioned in this interrogatory. It was, in substance, what I have above stated, and nothing more; and the statement in that letter is incorrect, and conveys the idea that I had in some way understood that such an agency was to be created by the Government, or required of the banks, and that said Whitney was to have it. I never heard or understood any such thing; and neither intended or expected that the remarks made by me, in this casual conversation, were to be used or repeated by said Whitney for the purpose of promoting the wishes he had expressed. The use of my name in the letter referred to, was without my knowledge or approbation. I was at that time the Attorney General of the United States, and certainly did not mean to advise such an appointment by the Executive or the Treasury Department, as is said in this interrogatory to have been suggested in the letter; nor to interfere, by advice or otherwise, with the deposits banks which the then Secretary might select, if he determined on the removal of the deposits.

2. To the second interrogatory I answer that while I was at the head of the Treasury Department I never gave the said Whitney a letter of recommendation, nor in any manner countenanced or encouraged him in applying for the agency referred to. I do not recollect that he ever applied to me to recommend him in any such application to the banks, or to any one else, or to countenance him in that capacity, except as contained in my answer to the third interrogatory.

3. To the third interrogatory I answer that the paper marked A in the Secretary's report, was presented to me by the said Whitney, who solicited at the same time the appointment mentioned. I refused the application upon the ground that it contemplated an appointment by the Department which the Executive had no right to make; and so informed him as soon as I looked at the paper. Disapproving the plan or scheme on which I based my refusal, he thought on what he called in that paper "preliminary observations," which I read over very hastily. I know of no part that the said Whitney took in the said measure further than that he brought the paper to me, and solicited the appointment as above stated, and had, as I was informed applied to the banks or this recommendation. And as to the part of the interrogatory which relates to Amos Kendall, I beg leave, respectfully, to refer the committee to the instructions given to him while W. J. Duane was Secretary of the Treasury, and to the report afterwards made by Amos Kendall to the Department, all of which are on the public files, and were, I think, communicated to the Senate, and printed when I was in the Department. I have never seen these papers since I left the Treasury, and it is impossible for me to speak of their contents from memory. If any such plan as that described in the paper A was then in existence, and known to Amos Kendall while acting as agent of the Treasury, it will, I presume, appear in these public papers; and I know of no plans on this subject then in existence or known to him beyond what are disclosed in the instructions given to him by the Treasury Department, and his official report to the Department before referred to.

4. To the fourth interrogatory, I answer that when the application of the said Whitney to the deposite bank in Baltimore, to join in the recommendation marked A, was pending before the bank, and some days before it was presented to me by said Whitney, I received a private letter from an officer of the bank, informing me of the application by said Whitney, and requesting to know whether it was done by him with my knowledge and concurrence. I answered the letter, saying that I had no knowledge of the application, and had given it no countenance or encouragement, and that I had no intention of appointing an agent. It is more than three years since this letter was written. I kept no copy of it, and speak of its contents from memory. But I believe the above was the substance of its contents; unless such a letter be deemed opposition to the recommendation by the bank, I made none. It was not intended as opposition, but as an answer to inquiry, for it was perfectly indifferent to me, whether the bank joined in recommendation or not, as that circumstance would not have changed the decision, nor have produced any difficulty.

5. To the last and general interrogatory, I answer, that while I was Secretary of the Treasury, none of the deposite banks ever had, to my knowledge, any agent residing at the seat of Government. I never understood, in any way, or supposed that any of them had any such agent. All their business with the department was transacted by letters from their own officers, directed to the Secretary of the Treasury; or by sending, as some of them occasionally did, their own officers to Washington, to have personal interviews with the Secretary. I have no knowledge, therefore, of the matters mentioned in the resolution, but what is derived from hearsay and public rumor.

Copy of Mr. TANNEY'S letter referred to in answer fourth.

(Private.) WASHINGTON, Oct. 22, 1833.
MY DEAR SIR: I have only a moment to say to you that Whitney's proposition is entirely unauthorized by me, and that I have no concern whatever with it; and, moreover, if all the selected banks were to recommend it, I would not appoint such an agent at this time, nor until I have more time to examine into its propriety; certainly there will be none until Congress decide what measures are to follow the removal of the deposits; and if one should even be selected, I am not committed to appoint Mr. Whitney. I am perfectly at large for a selection.
Very truly yours,

R. B. TANNEY.
Address private, THOMAS ELLICOTT, Esq.
Baltimore.

(Copy) WASHINGTON, Oct. 24, 1833.

(Private.) MY DEAR SIR: Although the time for closing the mail is almost at hand, I hope I have yet time to thank you for your friendly letter, and to assure you that I perfectly agree with you in the opinion you express about the reported appointment. My private letter to Mr. Ellicott has, I hope, been shown to you, and will remove any suspicion that I could have countenanced the plan. In the first place, there is no law authorizing the establishment of such a bureau; and it would be the grossest and most indefensible usurpation of power, if I presumed to make such an appointment. I never for a moment have dreamed of committing such a folly. Yet the imposing form of the papers given to Mr. Ellicott, coupled with the publication in the Standard, was well calculated to create the apprehension that I was participating in this wild scheme. But if I had authority, even by act of Congress, (and nothing short of an act of Congress would authorize it,) to establish such a bureau in my Department, rest assured it would not be given to the person you name. I believe he has been much wronged; but it is one of my fixed theories in politics, that a man must not only be qualified for the office he fills, but the public, who have an interest in it, must be satisfied of his fitness, or at least must not have made up their minds against him, and whatever may be the qualities of the person in question, his appointment to that office would, under existing circumstances, be received, I am sure, with one general, universal feeling of disapprobation by friends and foes; and rely on it, I will never mortify my friends by such an usurpation of power, nor by such an injudicious appointment, where I have a lawful right to fill an office. The whole proceeding has been the indiscreet act of the party himself, and wholly unauthorized by me.

"Again thanking you for your kind letter, I am very truly, your friend and obedient servant,

R. B. TANNEY."

"TO REVERDY JOHNSON, Esq." Answer by Mr. GARLAND.—The paper read, I believe to be a true copy of the evidence of the Hon. R. B. Taney, recorded the journal of the committee. Such a letter has been filed to-day with the evidence of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, as I am informed. The copy read is in the hand-writing of the clerk of the committee, and I presume is a true copy of the letter filed.

Question by the COUNSEL.—Was the accused in any way apprized of the intention of the committee to examine Chief Justice Taney, or Mr. Ellicott, or Mr. Johnson, on any matters touching his credit or character; and was he present, or notified to be present at their examination—or informed of the interrogatories to be submitted to them, or of their answers?

Answer.—I do not know that Mr. Whitney was apprized of the intention of the committee to examine Judge Taney, Mr. Ellicott, or Mr. Johnson, or upon which points they were to be examined; nor was he present when they were examined, or notified to be present; nor was he informed, within my knowledge, of the interrogatories propounded or answers given. Judge Taney was not examined in presence of the committee, nor was Mr. Johnson examined until to-day.

Question by the COUNSEL.—Was the accused informed by the committee, that they meant to require the production of the private letters written to Mr. Ellicott or Mr. Johnson, and now produced by the committee; and was he informed of the contents of the said letters? And was a vote of the committee taken as to the requisition of the said letters and their production? And was the writers of these letters apprized that they were to be required or produced?

Answer.—Mr. Whitney was not apprized by the committee, within my knowledge, that the production of the private letters was required of Mr. Ellicott or Mr. Johnson, nor has he been informed of the contents of said letters. These peculiar letters were never required by the committee; they were produced, if I am not mistaken, under a general requisition of the committee for all correspondence touching the subjects of inquiry directed by the House. I do not recollect any vote of the committee as to these identical letters. Mr. Whitney was never apprized, within my knowledge, that these letters were to be required. I do not recollect that he ever asked any information about them, or that the committee ever gave him any. I do not know that Judge Taney was apprized that these letters had been required or produced.

A motion was made that the House adjourn. Prior to its being put, Mr. WHITNEY was conducted from the bar of the House, as before, by the Sergeant-at-arms; and then, The House adjourned.

R. M. WHITNEY'S CASE.

MONDAY, Feb. 20, 1837.

Question by COUNSEL.—Please to state under what order or requisition the private letters were called for by the committee, and give the contents of such order or requisition. And when the letters were presented to the committee by the witnesses, was any vote or opinion taken or expressed by the committee as to the use of the said letters? And was the writer of these letters, when under examination by the committee, apprized by the committee that his private letters relating to the subject as to which he was under examination, would be, or had been, required by the committee; or was the accused apprized of the order or requisition under which said private letters were called for?

Answer.—On the 20th day of January, a series of interrogatories, to be propounded to different witnesses at a distance, whose personal attendance it was thought difficult to procure, was agreed upon by the committee. This series, embracing thereby six interrogatories, will be found in the journal, a copy of which accompanies this answer, in these words:

[These interrogatories will all be found in the journal of the select committee, the first seven being essential to a correct understanding of this part of the case, were as follows:

1st. Copies of all papers, letters, orders, resolutions, or memoranda, in books or otherwise, going to show that the banks of deposite of the public money, of which they, respectively, are officers, have, by contract, joint or several, employed an agent at the seat of Government to transact their business with the Treasury Department.

2d. Copies of all contracts made with any and every such agent.

3d. Copies of all the correspondence which may have been carried on between said banks, or any of their officers, and said agent or agents, either before or since the formation of contracts with the Treasury Department, touching the deposits of the public money; and also, copies of all accepted or rejected contracts, proposed by said agent or agents, at any time.

4th. Copies of all correspondence, papers, memoranda, &c. tending to show "the character of the business which said agent or agents is (or are) so employed to transact;" whether of a date anterior, or subsequent, to the creation of such agency, or the execution of said contracts.

5th. Copies of all correspondence, books, letters, papers, memoranda, &c. going to show the amount of the compensation of said agent or agents, at this, and at all antecedent periods; and when, how, and by whom paid, and for what services.

6th. Copies of all papers, correspondence, &c. going to show whether said agent or agents has or have been employed at the request, or through the procurement, of the Treasury Department, or any officer thereof.]

7th. Copies of all correspondence, &c. calculated to show whether said agent or agents have been employed at the request, or through the procurement, advice, or consent of the Treasury Department, or any officer thereof.

A copy of these interrogatories were furnished Mr. Johnson; among others, the interrogatories under which I suppose he thought it his duty to produce the letter in question, are numbered in the series from three to seven inclusive; I find, however, on examining the journal of the committee, that, on the 13th instant, the question, a copy of which was herewith filed, was proposed by Mr. Peyton to be propounded to the witness by the consent of the committee, one member objecting; this interrogatory was also forwarded to Mr. Johnson; he, however, did not transmit any answers to the committee; but, on Saturday morning last, appeared in person to give his testimony. At the time he announced himself, the committee was not in session, but the members were in attendance upon the House, and where the present examination was going on. I told Mr. Johnson that the committee was not in session, and could not then take his examination; but I would try to get them together, and take his examination in the course of the day. He said his attendance was very inconvenient, and he was anxious to return as speedily as he could. I then conducted him into the committee room, placed before him the resolution of the House organizing the committee, and directing its inquiries, and told him he could do as many other witnesses had done—write out his answers to the interrogatories which had been propounded, looking to the resolution of the House as his guide. He wrote out his testimony, which was left with the clerk of the committee, and filed the letter in question with it. The committee was not in session at any time during his examination. I had no knowledge whatever that such a letter was in existence, until I was informed that Mr. Johnson had filed it. I have no knowledge that any member informed Mr. Johnson whether it is proper or not to produce said letter.

Copy of additional question propounded to Mr. REVERDY JOHNSON, on Monday, February 13.

"37. Did R. B. Taney give R. M. Whitney a letter of recommendation, or did he in any manner countenance or encourage him in applying for the agency referred to, or did he refuse to recommend or countenance him in that capacity, while he was at the head of the Treasury Department? Do you know of any correspondence on the subject of Mr. Taney with any one? If yes, state its contents, or file copies of the same. State fully all you may know on that subject."

Question by the COUNSEL.—Who moved the resolution and framed the interrogatories mentioned in your preceding answer? Among such interrogatories (having reference to R. M. Whitney) is not the 29th in these terms, to wit: "29. At the time he was so designated, were you acquainted with him personally; and was he favorably known to you either for capacity or integrity." Do you know of any other answers being returned to said interrogatory, except the following, extracted from your journal by your clerk; certified by him?

"W. D. Lewis's answer to the 29th interrogatory:—With Mr. Whitney, the agent employed by the Girard Bank, I have been personally acquainted for many years; and he has always been favorably known to me for capacity and integrity."

"Thomas C. Rockhill's (Girard Bank) answer to the 29th interrogatory:—Dependent has known him for about twenty years; has transacted a great deal of business of with him for years back; always found him a good merchant, correct and upright in his transactions, and he is favorably known to depend both for capacity and integrity."

"T. M. Bryan's (Girard Bank) answer to the 29th interrogatory:—Dependent has known him for many years, and he was favorably known to depend both for capacity and integrity."

"A. Stevenson's (President of Moyamensing Bank) answer to the 29th interrogatory:—Dependent knew him well when he resided in Philadelphia, and was favorably known to depend as a gentleman and a merchant, both for capacity and integrity."

"P. Reilly's (Moyamensing Bank) answer to the 29th interrogatory:—Dependent was acquainted with him some years ago; and did not entertain a favorable opinion of him, either for capacity or integrity. He would not then have trusted his private affairs with him. This opinion was founded on general rumor, which might have been true or false, and not upon any particular knowledge of dependent."

"R. White's (Manhattan Company) answer to 29th interrogatory:—I was previously acquainted with Mr. Whitney, and considered him well qualified for the office of agent to the bank, at Washington."

"Mechanics' Bank, New York, (29th interrogatory).—At the time Mr. Whitney was selected on the part of this bank, I was not acquainted with him personally; but, from the impression made upon us for capacity and qualifications from respectable sources, we were of course favorable to such selection."

"The Mechanics' Bank also states, in another place (answer 14th.)—Mr. Reuben M. Whitney having been represented to us as a person of great experience and practical knowledge of financial matters, was selected by the Mechanics' Bank as its agent or correspondent at the seat of Government, to furnish us with such general information in regard to the deposit banks, domestic exchanges, &c. as might be deemed official.

"COMMITTEE ROOM, Feb. 20th, 1837.

"In answer to the call of Mr. Whitney's Counsel, I have examined the depositions sent by the different banks, and extracted every thing I can find relating to Mr. Whitney's character, which will be found above.

SAMUEL HAMILTON,

Clerk to Mr. Garland's Committee.

Mr. GARLAND'S answer.—The series of resolutions from which the printed interrogatories referred to in my last answer were produced, were proposed by Mr. Peyton; the amendments which reduced them to their ultimate form, were principally offered by Mr. Hamer. The interrogatory of the 13th of the present month, was proposed by Mr. Peyton also. The 20th interrogatory of the series referred to is correctly quoted in the question now before me. I do not know that any answer to the said interrogatory has been returned besides those referred to in the question; if there have been, I do not recollect them.

Question by COUNSEL (in substance).—Please look at the examination of David Henshaw, and say what member or members of the committee proposed the interrogatory to which said Henshaw returned the following answer, to be found in the journal of the committee:

Mr. HENSHAW'S answer.—"I can not answer for the officers of the banks who recommended Mr. Whitney. I was not an officer in any bank at that time. I had myself known Mr. Whitney for some time previously; and I had heard him favorably spoken of by those who had known him longer, both for capacity and integrity. So far as my own personal knowledge of Mr. Whitney extends, it is favorable to his character for capacity and integrity."

[It might be as well here to state that on reference to the journal, it appears that the question was put by Mr. PEYTON, and was in the following words: "Was, or was not, Mr. R. M. Whitney, at the time the letter of recommendation before mentioned by you was laid before the board, favorably known to you, and the officers of that bank, as a gentleman of capacity as well as integrity? or did the board take the evidence furnished by that letter as satisfactory on both these points?"

Mr. LOVE objected to this interrogatory. He had said there day in and day out, while this inquiry was going on, endeavoring to prepare himself to submit to any course which the learned Counsel and gentlemen of the House might think proper to adopt; but the character of the House, and the position it occupied before the nation, required that there should be some grounds for the interrogatories put to witnesses by the Counsel. What was the question now proposed to be put? and what had it to do with the only subject matter legitimately before the House? What had this interrogatory to do with the question whether Whitney had or had not committed a contempt of the House? Was there a member in that House who did not see that during the preceding part of to-day's sitting, and a great part of Saturday, the question whether Whitney had committed a contempt had been utterly and in toto lost sight of, and they were proceeding in an investigation which, if not arrested by the House, would consume the whole of the remainder of the session. Inquiries were now making, not only as to what had occurred before the committee to which the alleged contempt had been offered, but as to what had occurred before an entirely different committee; and not only this, but the learned Counsel were now going into an entirely new field of inquiry. They were not content with bringing to light all the important occurrences which had transpired before the committee, but they were now propounding inquiries to ascertain from what members of the committee certain interrogatories had been propounded to witnesses before that committee. Now was this to be acquiesced in by the House? He would inquire whether questions of this sort had any thing to do with the only subject before the House, namely: Whether Whitney had or had not committed a contempt of the House. He would call upon the learned Counsel to state to the House the object of making inquiries of this kind; and if there was not good and sufficient reasons for propounding the interrogatory, Mr. L. must protest against it.

When they were within ten days of the end of the session, and in fact only six days left them to conclude all the important business of the nation yet unacted on, he trusted this case would not be agitated by introducing testimony of this kind. He was unwilling to sit there any longer listening to an examination, by way of ascertaining from the officers of certain banks the particulars as to the character of Reuben M. Whitney; and last of all, to hear the Counsel propound interrogatories to ascertain what particular member of the committee propounded this question to a witness, and what one propounded that question. He called upon all gentlemen who were desirous of disposing of the great and important measures yet before the House, to come forward and arrest this new and irrelevant course of proceeding.

Mr. JOSEPH, of counsel for the accused, (but who, from his position, and the stir in the Hall, was almost inaudible at the Reporters' desk,) was understood to remark that he had all along pursued a course intended to economise the time of the House, and that this interrogatory might have been responded to in one-twentieth of the time it took the gentleman from New York to make his objections to it; and if he (Mr. J.) were to argue over and over again to that House every time a question was objected to, he should have, on each occasion, to reargue the merits of the whole case. All that he should then say was, that it was very extraordinary that, after a witness under examination had been permitted, without the whisper of an objection from any quarter of the House, without any reflections or strictures on the part of the honorable gentleman who made so vehement an objection now, to answer the very question that showed or attempted to show the accused in an unfavorable light, by producing the letters of Mr. Taney and Mr. Duane, together with all the questions propounded to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Garland,) on Saturday, Mr. J. thought it indeed extraordinary, that when the Counsel followed the example set them by the members of the House, and sanctioned by the authority of the House, by merely bringing into view other parts of the same record, it should be objected to. Was the course of examination which had been so long tolerated by the House, to stop at the very point where the prisoner could take advantage of it? He trusted the common sense of justice and equity on the part of the House, would at least allow the same latitude, on the same points of testimony, which had been sanctioned for the other side.

On taking the question by tellers, the ayes being 42, noes 49, no quorum.

Mr. KEY, by leave, withdrew the interrogatory, and sent a request to the Chair, to be submitted to the House, explaining that the request would probably supersede the necessity of the interrogatory.

The CHAIR said it would not be in order while a witness was on the stand.

Mr. MERCER. I think it ought to be read, and then the House might judge of it.

The CHAIR then directed it to be read, as follows:

"The Counsel for the accused respectfully ask that that part of the journal of the committee showing the evidence of David Henshaw, be now read; the whole journal being decided by the House to be evidence in this case."

No action was taken on this request; it not being then in order to consider it.

Mr. KEY then proposed the following interrogatory to the witness: (Mr. Garland):

Question by COUNSEL.—After the signature of Mr. R. Johnson, to his deposition, there appears another answer to another interrogatory; please state who propounded that interrogatory, and when and where? State your knowledge fully; also whether such interrogatory, so propounded, was authorized by the committee, or by you, as chairman? and produce said interrogatory; state, also, whether the said deposition, of said witness, is sworn to.

Mr. LOVE said, if he understood that interrogatory, it was, in substance, the same as the other of the same character precisely. He therefore objected to it, and stated his reasons.

Mr. Speaker, said he, the subject of the inquiry, as I understand the interrogatory, is this: What member of the committee, of which the honorable gentleman from Virginia, now upon the stand, is chairman, propounded certain questions? Now, sir, I ask what is that to this accused, or to his Counsel, or to this House? Whose business is it if improper questions have been put by that committee, or questions so improper by any members of it as that the member or members so putting them, have or has been guilty of corruption, or deemed to be so, and their or his conduct in so doing a fair subject of inquiry? If this be so, then let complaints be preferred here. Let there be a complaint preferred against that committee, or the members or member of it who have or has been guilty of any such offence, and then go into proof that he or they put the question. But what, I again ask, have we now to do with the fact as to what member of that committee propounded certain interrogatories to any witness that had been examined by it? I say, Mr. Speaker, what has that fact to do with the question of contempt of Reuben M. Whitney? What has it to do with it? How does it touch it? Under what pretext can it be brought to bear upon the case of Whitney for a contempt of this House? Admit all that has been said or done in regard to the character of Whitney, and that it is fairly put in issue, yet what, after all that, under Heaven, have certain questions, and which member of the committee put those questions, to do with the issue made, or sought to be made, before this House? I say, nothing under Heaven; and, notwithstanding Counsel say it takes longer to oppose these questions than it would for the witness to answer them, that is no reason for invalidating an objection to an improper question. They may pursue these questions, in one form or other, till the last hour of the session; and are we never to stop it, because the objections made occupy more of the time of the House than the witness would in answering the question? I trust, Mr. Speaker, this House has more regard for its own reputation. Why, sir, I say it unhesitatingly, that if any course taken by this House has the effect of protracting this matter, it is the proceedings already had, and which, I would say, were it in order, would disgrace every justice's court in any district of the country. Sir, I will not sit here quietly, without raising my voice in protesting against it.

Mr. KEY was proceeding to reply, when

Mr. WISE rose, and asked leave to report some matters before the other select committee, of which he himself was chairman.

The CHAIR said it was not in order.

Mr. WISE merely wished, he said, to hand in some extracts from the journal of his committee.

The CHAIR repeated that it was not in order.

Mr. WISE. It is only extracts sir.

The CHAIR. It can only be done by the unanimous consent of the House.

The CHAIR again reminded the gentleman from Virginia that he was interposing between the right of the Counsel for the accused to reply to the objection made to his interrogatory.

Mr. WISE again pressed his motion, but it was objected to.

Mr. KEY (one of the counsel) then proceeded to reply to Mr. Love. It appeared him, he said, that the gentleman from New York did not recollect what had been already done by the House, but, he supposed, a simple statement of it would remove the gentleman's objection.

It had, then, been already decided by the House, that the whole journal of the select committee, to which the gentleman had referred, was in evidence in this cause. Every deposition taken was in evidence, and every part of it. Now, if that be the case—and that it was, he need only appeal to the proceedings of the House, its votes, and the facts, showing that on Saturday last, under that authority, under that decision of the House, the whole journal was put in as evidence, and various parts of it called for, and read by the clerk; for instance, that portion containing the evidence, and the paper produced by Mr. Reverdy Johnson. Mr. K. presumed, therefore, that it was undeniable that the whole of Mr. Johnson's deposition, taken by that committee, was then in evidence before that House. Now, if that be the case, and he had shown that it was the case, on what possible grounds of law or justice could the objection to the interrogatory then made be sustained?

Mr. K. said they wanted to know if that deposition was, in whole or in part, properly taken, and proper testimony before the House; if that letter had been duly sworn to. They wanted to know if the interrogatories were all put by the authority of the committee, and if the answers were all properly delivered; or, whether interrogatories had not been put to Mr. Johnson which ought never to have been put to him. That was the object of the inquiry, and he insisted upon their right to propound it.

Mr. PEYTON here interposed, and said he wished to set the learned Counsel right in regard to the facts of that case. Mr. Johnson (he said) appeared before the committee, but there was not, and could not be got together, a quorum of it at the time the chairman called a meeting. Mr. P. was directed to go down and see Mr. Johnson, in reference to his evidence. At that time, the Counsel for the accused had already propounded interrogatories in relation to it, and had made an effort to obtain from the journal every answer given to the twenty-ninth interrogatory. Mr. Johnson had answered all the interrogatories (as the committee supposed) fully, and put his name to the paper containing them. Mr. P. said: I then first told him that I would ask him another question, but, after a few words, I then suggested to him what he himself had told me—that he could consistently tell the whole truth, and could append a further answer to the twenty-ninth interrogatory, already propounded to, and answered by, him. Upon that suggestion, having believed that he had not fully answered all he knew, he made a further answer, striking out his name, putting the further answer thereafter, and afterwards re-signing his name, as an answer to that whole interrogatory.

Now, (continued Mr. P.) the gentleman would at once see the importance of that interrogatory. It was, whether the accused was known to him favorably for integrity as well as capacity. Mr. Johnson knew, from information, a great deal more upon the subject of this man's integrity and character than what he had already stated, viz: he had understood enough to enable him to make the statement which he did in regard to that individual's associations with blacklegs and gamblers in the city of Philadelphia. I said Mr. P. considered it important; Mr. Reverdy Johnson considered it important; but I asked no new question, because the committee were not present. This answer of Mr. Johnson, he repeated, was given to the twenty-ninth interrogatory.

Mr. KEY had no sort of objection to the explanation made by the gentleman; but still (said Mr. KEY) we are brought back again to the question, whether or not an interrogatory proposed to this witness be a competent one or not? Now I want to know, sir, if when a part of a deposition that was read before the House on Saturday, by the other side, as evidence, was admitted, whether I cannot make an inquiry in relation to it, for the purpose of showing whether that very deposition was proper or not, properly taken or not; showing, sir, that the deposition which has been thus read before the House has never been sworn to at all? I want to know whether I shall be precluded from showing, as I shall be able to show, that that part of the deposition which follows the deponent's name on the paper, is an answer to no interrogatory; or at least an answer to an inadmissible interrogatory, put to him by no authority whatever; nay, more, sir, that when similar questions were attempted to be put to other witnesses, they were objected to by the committee. How can the House object to this? The whole journal is in evidence, and this is part of the journal; and, sir, the deposition being already in evidence, am I not to inquire who put that second or additional interrogatory; under what circumstances the answer to it was taken; or, in the language of the interrogatory, whether any part of that deposition, which has been read to this House as testimony, is testimony at all?

The CHAIR was about to propound the question, the Counsel for the accused having finished his reply, when

Mr. PEYTON again interposed, and desired to make a further statement.

The CHAIR said he would ascertain whether it was the general sense of the House or not that the gentleman should do so.

Mr. PEYTON. By permission of the House, I will give the facts, which will satisfy the Counsel that he is laboring under misapprehension.

Mr. GHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, I must object to any farther interruption. The Counsel has replied to the objections raised against his interrogatory; and, under the order of the House, it is not competent for any gentleman to speak afterwards. I insist, sir, upon the question being put.

The CHAIR then put the question, whether the interrogatory should be propounded; when there being, ayes 63, noes 36, no quorum—

Mr. GHOLSON moved a call of the House; which was lost without a division.

Mr. THOMSON of Ohio asked for the yeas and nays on the question of putting the interrogatory; but there was again no quorum—ayes 25, noes 95.

Mr. CAMBRELING requested the Chair to ascertain if there was a quorum within the hall.

The CHAIR had no doubt of it, if gentlemen would come within the bar and vote.

Mr. GHOLSON moved an adjournment, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, stating that he made both motions in order that, by calling over the roll, it might bring a quorum.

The House refused to order the yeas and nays. Mr. GHOLSON withdrew the motion to adjourn, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on the question, "Shall this interrogatory be put?" the question was so taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Heman, Allen, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Black, Booke, Borden, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Coles, Corwin, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Denny, Doubleday, Dunlap, Evans, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Gholsen, Granzer, Graves, Grenell, Griffin, J. S. Hall, Hiland Hall, Harlan, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Haynes, Henderson, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Hunterman, Ingersoll, Jarvis, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Lane, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Joshua Lee, Luke Lea, Leonard, Lucas, Lyen, Abiah Mann, Job Mann, Moses Mason, Sampson Mason, Maury, McCarthy, McKennan, McKim, Mercer, Milligan, Morgan, Page, Parke, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, Potts, Reed, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Sprague, Standford, Steele, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, John Thomson, Toney, Washington, White, Thomas T. Whiteley, Sheard Williams, and Yell—112.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anthony, Bailey, Barton, Bond, Boon, Cambreleng, Chapman, Chapin, Clark, Cramer, Deberry, Dromgole, Ether, Grantland, Graven, Haley, Hawkins, Herod, Hoar, Holt, Howell, Hunt, William Jackson, Cave Johnson, Kennon, Love, Loyal, William Mason, McKay, McLene, Montgomery, Parker, Pearson, Pettigrew, Rencher, Schenck, Shields, Turrill, Vanderpool, Ward, Wardwell, Webster and Lewis Williams.—43.

So the House decided that the interrogatory should be put. The witness then returned the following:

Answer.—I have not read Mr. Johnson's testimony, and do not know its contents. The committee was not in session at any time during the time he was engaged in stating his testimony, and of course did not authorize the interrogatory referred to by Mr. Johnson; if one was propounded to him, I do not know who propounded the interrogatory. I had no authority as chairman to authorize it and did not do so. I administered the usual oath to Mr. Johnson, while he was engaged in writing his testimony.

CROSS EXAMINATION OF MR. GARLAND.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did not Mr. Peyton suggest to you the propriety of calling the committee together before Mr. Johnson should be discharged?

Answer.—I think he did, but it was difficult to get them together, owing to the examination now going on; nor did I think it necessary, unless new interrogatories were to be propounded.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Do you consider, upon examination of the testimony of Mr. Johnson, herewith furnished for your inspection, that there was any additional interrogatory propounded to him; and it is not the fact that his attention was called to the 29th interrogatory, by being asked if he had any information to give under that interrogatory?

Answer.—Upon reading Mr. Johnson's statement referred to in the question, I find the following passage: "Dependent being asked whether he has any knowledge or information of Mr. Whitney's general character for capacity and integrity, as asked for in the twenty-ninth interrogatory, at any time subsequent to the date to which such interrogatory applies," &c. whether such interrogatory as he states was propounded to him, I do not know. If it were, I did not hear it. It was his duty to have answered fully the twenty-ninth interrogatory, and to authorize him to do that, no new interrogatory was necessary. How far a new interrogatory was necessary to authorize the witness to answer the twenty-ninth interrogatory, embracing a period of time subsequent to the period embraced in that interrogatory, is matter of construction which the House can as well determine as I can. I do not recollect whether his attention was called to the twenty-ninth interrogatory or not, for I was but a few minutes in the committee room with him, while he was stating his evidence.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Were not numerous interrogatories propounded to Mr. Whitney himself, and to other persons with his knowledge, which from there nature, were well calculated to inform him that the committee were proceeding to take testimony in relation to the matter alluded to in the evidence given by Chief Justice Taney, and by Mr. Johnson; and had not the committee come to an understanding themselves, informally, that it would be proper to hear any witnesses, or other testimony furnished, either by the Secretary of the Treasury or Mr. Whitney, touching any matter which might be in evidence against them, or either of them?

Answer.—The journal of the committee contains all the interrogatories proposed, whether propounded or not, and a reference to them will best answer this question. I think many of them were well calculated to apprise Mr. Whitney that testimony of the character given by Judge Taney and Mr. Johnson, was expected to be taken. My recollection is, that every member of the committee expressed their willingness to receive any explanatory or exculpatory evidence from any person who might be implicated in the course of the investigation.

MR. FAIRFIELD'S RE-EXAMINATION.

Mr. PEYTON here asked leave to submit a question to another witness.

The CHAIR said it was not in order.

Mr. PEYTON. I suppose it may by general consent.

The CHAIR cannot put it.

Mr. PEYTON. But if the House is willing, will the Chair object? Does the Chair object?

The CHAIR does not object, but he cannot put it without the general assent of the House.

Mr. THOMAS suggested that the best course, and to obviate all difficulty, would be for the gentleman from Tennessee to pass his interrogatory to the committee and the Counsel.

Mr. PEYTON said he understood that one of the Counsel of the accused, having looked at the question, was perfectly willing that Mr. Fairfield should take it and answer it, and Mr. P. hoped the House would indulge him.

The CHAIR inquired if it was intended to supersede the witness upon the stand?

Mr. PEYTON replied in the negative, and stated that the interrogatory and answer could lie over till the other witness was disposed of.

The interrogatory was then read, as follows:

Question by Mr. PEYTON.—In one of your former answers you alluded to a conversation between R. M. Whitney and others in your presence, after the 25th January; I wish you to state, in explanation of said answer, who were present at that time, to whom said Whitney made the remarks as stated in your answers; were it was, whether in the night or day time, and state fully all that was said by said Whitney, or others, upon the same subject, upon that occasion.

Mr. FAIRFIELD took the question, and was desired to answer it after the examination of the witness then on the stand was closed.

MR. GARLAND'S EXAMINATION RESUMED.

Question by COUNSEL.—And was the accused or his Counsel informed that Mr. Johnson was here, and that he was about to give evidence to be used in the present case?

Answer.—He was not, within my knowledge.

Question by COUNSEL.—Was there, at any time, any communication made to the accused, notifying him that he might be present at the taking of, or in any other way informed of, the testimony that had been taken, or might be taken, affecting him or his evidence? Was not a resolution to that effect offered, and was it not laid on the table, and never afterwards called up? Is not that the resolution at page 127-8, in these words, to wit:

"Resolved, That if any of the evidence that now is, or hereafter shall be, before this committee, shall be deemed, by any member thereof, to criminate the official conduct of any officer of the Government, or the private character of any such officer, or other person, the same shall not be published or considered as evidence, until such officer or person shall have an opportunity to rebut or explain the same; and, to enable him to do so, he shall be notified of the matter objected to, and furnished with the evidence upon which the objection rests."

Answer. The resolution referred to speaks for itself. The original resolution is truly copied in the printed journal now before the House. This resolution has not been called up. Mr. Whitney never received, within my knowledge, any such notification as stated in the question; nor do I recollect that he ever requested the committee to give him any such.

Question by Mr. PEYTON.—In the proposition submitted by Mr. Gillet, to which reference has just been made, was the objection to the same made to receiving any explanatory evidence, either oral or written, from said Whitney, or any other persons; or was the objection confined to; and excluding all evidence so taken, until any person supposed to be affected was heard, as tending to exclude a large portion of the evidence already taken?

Answer.—I have heretofore stated that I understood every member of the committee willing to receive exculpatory or explanatory evidence from any person implicated. The difficulty with some members in adopting the resolution proposed by Mr. Gillet was, that it excluded all evidence of that character, until the person implicated was notified that it was to be introduced. I remember a discussion among the members of the committee upon this as a legal proposition, so far as it prevailed in the courts of judicature.

The witness (Mr. Garland) was then discharged from the stand.

RE-EXAMINATION OF MR. FAIRFIELD RESUMED.

Mr. FAIRFIELD then returned an answer (embodied in the following below) to the above interrogatory, put by Mr. PEYTON, pending the examination of Mr. GARLAND, which, having been read—

Mr. PEYTON said, Mr. Speaker, he has not answered as to the time and place.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It was on the evening; the answer, I believe, states when the gentleman made his statement in the House; and it was at Mr. Gillet's room.

The answer was then read again, and the witness asked to have it returned to him, which was ordered.

The witness then returned the following answer in full:

Answer.—As I have before stated, I was not present in the House at the time Mr. Wise and Mr. Peyton called up the case of the occurrence of the 25th of January, and made their statements respecting it; but on the adjournment of the House, I was informed that they had so done, and that Mr. Wise had called upon all the members of the committee to make statements also. It then occurred to me that it would be well to reduce to writing the facts as they rested in my recollection; and I accordingly retired to my chamber, and wrote out the statement, which is in substance my answer to the first interrogatory, without consultation with any member of the committee, and before I had read the statements of Messrs. Wise and Peyton. After having done this, I felt a natural anxiety to see how far it corresponded with the recollection of other members of the committee; and accordingly the same evening or the next I called on Messrs. Hamer, Gillet and Martin and exhibited to them my statement. I was pleased to find that they substantially agreed with me, though their recollection embraced a few facts not distinctly in my mind.

When I called upon Mr. Gillet it was early in the evening, and, finding Mr. Whitney there, I did not take a seat, and stopped only a few minutes. In reply to Mr. Gillet's invitation to take a chair, I told him I had drawn up a statement of the facts in relation to the occurrence of the 25th of January, and that I would call him in the course of the evening, and exhibit it to him. This led to some remark of Mr. Whitney about the statement of Mr. Wise, but I do not recollect distinctly what it was, which was followed by the remarks, the substance of which was given in my answer to the fifteenth question proposed by the Hon. Mr. Bell. I think Mr. Gillet made some remark, but I have no recollection as to what it was. At some time while I was there, I think I remarked to Mr. Gillet that Mr. Wise had made a worse case for himself than Mr. Whitney's statement had made, having heard so much of Mr. Whitney's remarks repeated as related to his intention in case Mr. Whitney had moved his elbow an inch. This did not occur to me when I answered the previous question upon this subject. I then retired, called upon Mr. Martin, and, in the course of perhaps half an hour, returned; and, finding Mr. Gillet alone, I exhibited my statement to him, and was pleased to find that it accorded substantially with his recollection. No others were present, nor can I recollect distinctly any thing further that was said.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Did you furnish a copy of your statement to Mr. Whitney, or any other person, before you gave your answer to the first interrogatory? Or did you put the original statement into the possession of any other person before that time; and, if yes, into whose?

Mr. BOON objected to this interrogatory, as being wholly irrelevant to the subject matter which the House had to decide upon. The whole of Saturday and four hours of this day's sitting had been taken up in asking questions, and debating points arising therefrom, which had no connection with the main question before the House, namely, whether or not Whitney had offered a contempt to the House; and if they were to go on, calling upon the stenographers for their opinions in relation to one point, and upon other gentlemen for their opinions in relation to another point, this question would not be disposed of when the evening of the 3d of March would put a period to the existence of the twenty-fourth Congress.

Mr. BELL concurred, he said, most heartily with the gentleman, not only that all the time of that day, Saturday, and the preceding days, had been wasted, but that, from the very moment the accused had been placed at the bar, nothing legal or parliamentary connected with his case of contempt, had taken place, nor, to Mr. B.'s understanding, any thing what the House ought to have done in the case. Upon no other ground had he himself voted as he had done upon repeated occasions, and upon the propositions of Counsel; and upon no other ground would he have asked, or as a member of the House, could he have asked, a number of the interrogatories he had propounded. He would candidly admit his own interrogatories to be irregular, so far as the abstract case was concerned; but then, he contended, they stood upon the same ground of propriety, justice, and equal rights, as others that had been propounded by Counsel. There was, however, no need for further recrimination. He would only advert to what had been said at the very outset of this question, not only by himself, but, upon a subsequent occasion, by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Chambers), that this proceeding was not the trial of Mr. Whitney for contempt or alleged contempt. Mr. B. remembered also, and it might not be improper then to refer to it, that the very first day when the proposition came up, he appeared, in terms as strong as he could, to the sound judgment, the sound and practical experience, of that House, to terminate this question immediately, by the only ordinary and established mode of proceeding, recognised both by that House and by the British parliament; and that was simply to ask Mr. Whitney, upon oath, whether he had refused to obey the summons from the select committee either from apprehensions of personal outrage, or through personal fear.

Mr. B. had furthermore stated, that if Mr. Whitney would answer in the affirmative, there was an end of the question; for it was not for the House to inquire, whether the grounds of his fears were small or weighty; or whether the conduct of the gentlemen referred to had been outrageous, and such as to cause any man to fear, not only personal violence, but personal outrage. His answer in the affirmative, and the case was at an end. They (the House) were bound to discharge him from the contempt, and it was within his own breast, and not for them to inquire, whether the outrage was a gross or a trivial one. Mr. B. had stated, moreover, what ought to have been done, viz: that if the accused did answer in the affirmative, they must be decisive; or, if they wanted his testimony before the select committee, it was their bounden duty to protect the witness; and Mr. B. did not consider this would have implicated the character of the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman. Had the accused any apprehensions? If so, let him state them, and there was an end to the inquiry, and all that had taken place was out of the inquiry.

But the question had taken an extraordinary course—a course implicating two honorable gentlemen as members of the committee, and members of that House. The consequence of this singular and anomalous course of proceeding had been to bring those gentlemen before the House and the country, while Mr. Whitney had been lost sight of—notoriously so; and, moreover, while learned gentlemen had been permitted to defend Mr. Whitney with their own interrogatories in the face of that House and the country, they had themselves carefully and positively dispreved the alleged ground of the disobedience of this witness. The gentleman from Maine (Mr. Fairfield), the first witness called on the stand, who had answered with candor, and to the best of his knowledge and belief on the subject, expressly stated, in his answer on his first examination, that Mr. Whitney admitted to him that he had no fear of Mr. Peyton, although he expected he had arms in his bosom, and that he stood erect, cool, and collected; that he did not fear Mr. Peyton's threatening, though that gentleman had his hand in his bosom, because he (Whitney) intended to spring forward, and with his own arm have thrown him into the fire.

But it was alleged that the witness founded his new ideas of fear from what the gentleman from Virginia had said. Why the learned gentlemen themselves had proved this to be an unfounded assertion. Here was Mr. Peyton within four or six feet of Mr. Whitney, threatening him with personal violence at the time, and having arms in his bosom, which he could instantly have drawn upon him; yet there he stood—erect, cool, collected, undaunted, and they had been particular in proving Mr. Whitney to be a man of courage; and Mr. B. would put it to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Boone) whether it was not clearly part of the business and duty, or what he conceived to be the duty, of Counsel after that, to disprove the ground upon which was based the alleged excuse for disobedience to the summons? They had come before that House, and I asked it to undergo ceremonies, Mr. B. ought not, perhaps, to say of additional contempt to the known authority of this House, to hear witnesses interrogated, and after all they have proved they committed a contempt within the authority stated in the paper, for their client has no fears.

Now, let him ask, what would all this result in? What would it be made to result in? Implications upon honorable members of that body. The journals of the country had been already polluted with the statements that had gone forth, and there was not an honorable member of that House but was willing to bury it all in oblivion, and that it should have been withheld from the public journals of the country. The only consequence had been to arraign his friend from Virginia, and his colleague, and to spread upon the journals language offensive to all persons.

It was upon these grounds that Mr. B. wished the gentleman from Indiana to understand that he, (Mr. Bell), as an individual, had felt himself authorized to propound the numerous interrogatories he had done. He affirmed that they were at least as pertinent as other interrogatories put by learned Counsel, and as important in their character; arranged, as theirs had obviously been, to arraign those two gentlemen before the country.

Mr. B. asked, were gentlemen willing to withhold their aid and assistance to have this matter fully ferreted out? If the proceeding was irregular, was not the presumption irresistible that the motive was irregular? The inquiry he was seeking would at least bring out gentlemen to say what other motive could have existed. The single and only question was, had Mr. Whitney been guilty or not guilty of a contempt of that House, upon the ground that he feared personal ill usage or outrage? Whether his grounds were just or not, was of no consequence with the House; because, if he answered in the affirmative, there was an end of the case. If, however, they wanted his testimony, they must protect him by the Sergeant-at-arms, or by the messengers.

In conclusion, Mr. B. felt, he said, that the course he had himself taken was not altogether what, as a judge, it ought to have been; but he rested his excuse on the ground of the extraordinary course of the whole proceeding. He confessed he had not considered himself in the light of a judge, but free to act in vindicating the character of gentlemen on that floor who had been indirectly attacked and implicated in a manner the most extraordinary and unprecedented. He trusted, upon these grounds, at all events for a few hours longer, that he should be permitted to go on with this investigation in the manner he proposed, and that the gentleman from Indiana, in exercising his own feelings, would not, however, insist upon his objection.

On taking the question on this interrogatory, the ayes were 37, the noes 49, and there being no quorum.

Mr. MANN of New York moved a call of the House. Mr. VANDERPOOL asked for the yeas and nays; giving as his reason for doing so, that the call of the roll would answer the purpose of a call of the House in producing a quorum; but the House refused to order them; and, by tellers, a majority of those present ordered a call of the House—being yeas 50, noes 33.

The roll having been called through, and the absentees twice called, and 118 members only having answered to their names, still no quorum.

Mr. HEISTER moved to dispense with all further proceedings in the call: lost.

At different stages the same motion was renewed by Messrs. HARDIN and BRIGGS, with the same result; when, after being occupied nearly two hours, the further proceedings were dispensed with, on motion of Mr. BELL, and, on the doors being opened, a quorum appeared.

The question, on putting the above interrogatory, was then taken by tellers, and decided in the negative—ayes 72, noes 73.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not put to the witness.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Have you had any conversation with the President upon the subject of the course of Messrs. Wise and Peyton as members of Congress, during the past and present sessions of Congress? or have you been present, at any time, when he expressed any opinion in relation to it? and, if so, did you hear him state that they ought to be "Hous-tonized," meaning thereby that they ought to be chastised in the streets, or express himself to that effect? and, if yes, did you hear him thus express himself in speaking of their course or conduct towards Mr. Whitney?

Mr. MANN of New York said, that was certainly a most extraordinary inquiry, and he must object to it. He would not, however, consume the time of the House by showing its impropriety, since he believed it must be perfectly obvious to every one.

Mr. BELL begged the indulgence of the House for a few moments to give the reasons why he had thought proper to propound such an interrogatory.

He would state, in the first place, that he would not have done so had he not considered it material, under the course of examination pursued on the trial of Mr. Whitney towards his (Mr. B's) colleague, and towards his honorable friend from Virginia, (Messrs. Peyton and Wise.) The House well knew that those gentlemen had been, in fact, the parties against whom charges had been brought. It had been alleged that their conduct had been exceptionable, on the ground that they carried fire arms about their persons; and Mr. B. had propounded this interrogatory to show that there existed extraordinary grounds for their doing so; that there were extraordinary reasons for their wearing arms about their persons constantly, every day, in coming to and going from that House, in coming to and going from their committees, and that they could not conceive they could safely walk the streets, in justice to themselves and their families, without bearing arms upon their persons. They had had the evidence of this course of denunciation for some time past, and this interrogatory was propounded with the expectation, that either from the gentleman then under examination, or from some other honorable member of that House, and, perhaps, from other witnesses, this fact could be proven.

The interrogatory proposed to inquire whether the President, upon more than one occasion, had not said, in relation to those gentlemen, members of the House; that they should be, or ought to be, chastised in the public streets for their conduct towards Mr. Whitney; and that he particularly used the word "Hous-tonized," as expressed in that interrogatory. Now, if that be true, if it be true that the Executive head of these United States was in the habit of denouncing members of that House in such terms, and pending the transactions which have been the foundation of the present proceedings, was it not important to these gentlemen, as a justification of their course on that occasion, and on any other occasion, that they should bear fire arms about their persons? Besides, it should be borne in mind, that this was General Jackson who made this declaration, if what is alleged be true. It was not a private individual, but the President of the United States, the dispenser of all the patronage of the Government, who had more influence, more power, than belonged to most crowned heads. Mr. B. appealed to members whether that was not a material inquiry in reference to the transaction in the committee, and the alleged ground of defence of the gentlemen from Virginia and Tennessee in carrying fire arms. Mr. B. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were yeas 54, nays 100, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. A. Allan, Bell, Bond, Buchanan, Bunch, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, G. Chambers, J. Chambers, Childs, N. H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Everett, Forester, Granger, Grennell, Griffin, H. Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, Hazeltine, Herod, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, James, Lewis, S. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Mercer, Phillips, Pickens, Reed, Rencher, Russell, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Waddy Thompson, Vinton, White, Sherrod Williams, and Yell—54.

NAYS—Messrs. H. Allen, Ash, Bailey, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, J. F. H. Claiborne, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Dawson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmer, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, Grantland, J. Hall, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holt, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Wm. Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Lawrence, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, William Mason, May, McKay, McKeon, McKim, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Page, Patterson, Dutce J. Pearce, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Taylor, John Thomson, Turritt, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, and Wardwell—100.

So the House determined that the interrogatory be not propounded to the witness.

Question by Mr. BELL.—Was not the accompanying interrogatory and others, embracing every material point in the character of Mr. Whitney, propounded in the select committee, of which the honorable Mr. Garland of Virginia, is chairman, to the honorable Levi Woodbury, and Richard S. Coxe, Esq., and William D. Lewis, and others, overruled by a majority of the committee?

"32. Do you know R. M. Whitney's general character? If yes, what is his character, as an honest trustworthy man? Would you, from his general character, believe him on his oath, or trust him, when he was subject to great pecuniary temptation to err."

"This question was objected to by Mr. GILLET, and rejected."

Mr. BOON objected to this interrogatory; and whilst up, he would take occasion to say, that he would object to all questions of this kind. He would say, however, to the gentleman from Tennessee, that his objection was not out of any disrespect to him, or to the gentleman from Virginia, for towards either of those gentlemen, he entertained no other feelings than those of the highest respect. But from a solemn and high duty to his constituents, and from the many important questions now before the House—not only important to the people of the West, but important to the whole nation, he felt impelled to interpose, to endeavor to arrest this wide range of inquiry, and confine it within proper limits. If this question was suffered to be put, gentlemen on the other side must be permitted to put similar interrogatories, and there would be no end to the investigation. He hoped, therefore, that the House would decide against all questions of this description.

Mr. BELL observed that the Counsel for the accused had introduced testimony paying tribute to the high character of Whitney, to which no objection had been interposed; therefore they desired to have the opportunity of bringing in testimony the reverse of this. He would say no more, but leave the matter to the good sense of the House, hoping they would see the importance of allowing this question to be put to come to a correct conclusion.

The question was then taken, and it was decided that the interrogatory should not be put.

The witness, Mr. Fairfield, was then discharged from the stand.

Mr. BELL said he wished to propound an inquiry or two, to the clerk of the select committee. [He did not appear.]

Mr. LANE asked leave to submit a resolution.

Mr. GHOLSON said he wished to call up another witness, who had been summoned by the committee of examination. [Mr. Hamilton, the clerk of the select committee, of which Mr. Garland was chairman.]

Mr. LANE. There being no question before the House, then submitted his resolution as follows:

Resolved. That it is inexpedient to prosecute further the alleged contempt of Reuben M. Whitney, against the authority of this House, and that said Whitney be now discharged from custody.

Mr. GHOLSON wished to know whether the investigation on the part of the committee could be stopped in this way.

The CHAIR replied that that was a question for the House, not the Chair, to determine. The witness was off the stand, and the same question arose the other day.

Mr. LANE then said: Mr. Speaker, the only speech I have to make on this resolution, is to move the previous question.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, can a gentleman take the floor, present a resolution, and call for the previous question, without the power of the House to amend it?

The CHAIR. Certainly.

Mr. STORER. Mr. Speaker, the point of order I inquire about, is this: Whether it is competent for any member of this House, while this House is organized as a judicial tribunal, to cut off, by this guillotine sort of process, the right of the accused to be heard by his Counsel?

The CHAIR. That is a matter for the consideration of the House. The House may vote according to its discretion, or according to its judgment.

Mr. JONES (of counsel for the accused.) Can not this proposition be amended, sir?

The CHAIR. No proposition can be amended after the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WISE. Is there not a witness upon the stand?

The CHAIR. There is not.

Mr. WISE. Has not the clerk of the select committee been summoned?

The CHAIR has issued a subpoena for him, but he was not called on the stand.

Mr. WISE. Have there not been questions propounded which have not been answered?

Mr. GHOLSON. I gave the clerk seventeen interrogatories, which he has not answered.

The CHAIR, as the presiding officer of the House, knows nothing of it.

Tellers having been appointed, the previous question was then seconded by the House—ayes 78, noes 64; and on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. CRAIG asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 92, nays 71, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dunlap, Elmer, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, Galbraith, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Holt, Howard, Huntington, Ingham, William Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, William Mason, May, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Page, Patterson, Patton, Dutce J. Pearce, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Richardson, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucer, Turritt, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whiteley, and Yell—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Heman Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Briggs, Bunch, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Dromgoole, Elmore, Evans, Forester, French, Gholson, Granger, Grantland, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, James, John W. Jones, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lewis, Love, Lyon, McCarty, McComas, Milligan, Parker, Pearson, Phillips, Pickens, Reed, Rencher, Russell, Shields, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Vinton, Washington, White, Sherrod Williams, and Young—71.

So the main question was ordered to be put; and on the main question, being on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. CHAPIN asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 99, nays 72, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cramer, Crary, Cushman, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Elmer, Farlin, Fowler, French, Fry, Galbraith, Haley, Joseph Hall, Hawkins, Harper, Henderson, Holt, Howard, Huntington, Samuel Ingham, William Jackson, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Lansing, Laporte, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, William Mason, May, McKay, McKeon, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Owens, Page, Patterson, Patton, Dutce J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Rogers, Schenck, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Sprague, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Toucer, Turritt, Vanderpool, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Thomas T. Whiteley, and Yell—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, H. Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bunch, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Forester, Graham, Granger, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Harlan, Harper, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hero, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Huntsman, Ingersoll, James, Jenifer, Lawler, Lawrence, Luke Lea, Lewis, Love, Lyon, Maury, McCarty, McKenhan, Mercer, Milligan, Parker, Pearson, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Russell, Shields, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Vinton, Washington, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, and Young—72.

So the resolution was adopted; and Mr. WHITNEY was thereupon ordered to be discharged from custody.

Just as the CHAIR was announcing the order for the discharge of the accused—

Mr. PEYTON interposed, and said before the accused was dismissed, he wished to propound a question to him, and that he be detained for that purpose. [Cries of no! no! from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. PEYTON thereupon moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, saying, "Then gentlemen will have an opportunity of recording their no! no!"

Mr. MANN of New York, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 94, nays 68.

When the name of Mr. WISE was called, that gentleman rose in his place, and, addressing the Chair, said: Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote until I ascertain whether I am discharged from prosecution or not.

The House then adjourned.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR AD INTERIM.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
December 3, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with your directions, I have the honor to lay before you the usual annual reports of the several divisions of this department, and to submit, for your consideration, a summary of the contents of those documents, together with such additional statements and suggestions as seemed to me to be required by the present condition and necessities of the public service.

I. THE ARMY.

1. Organization and force.—It appears, from the report of Major General Macomb, and the tables annexed to it, that the regular army of the United States, consists of 648 commissioned officers, and 7,310 non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates; making an aggregate of 7,958—organized as follows: General Staff, 14, viz: one major general commanding; two brigadier generals, each commanding one of the two military districts into which the United States are divided; one adjutant general; two inspectors general; one quartermaster general, and four quartermasters; and one commissary general of subsistence, and two commissaries; Pay Department, 18, viz: one paymaster general, and seventeen paymasters; Medical Department, 76, viz: one surgeon general, fifteen surgeons, and sixty assistant surgeons; Purchasing Department, 3, viz: one commissary general of purchases, and two military storekeepers; Corps of engineers, 22; topographical engineers, 10; Ordnance Department, (including 294 non-commissioned officers and enlisted men); two regiments of dragoons, each containing ten companies of sixty privates each; four regiments of artillery, each containing nine companies of forty-two privates each; and seven regiments of infantry, each containing ten companies of forty-two privates each.

The present actual force of the regular army, according to the last general return, is 6,283; but if also appears from that return, that after making the necessary deductions for sickness and other circumstances, the available force for service in the field, at the latest dates, was 4,282. The difference between the actual force (6,283) and the force allowed by law (7,958) is 1,675, and is occasioned by the fact, that only 360 recruits have yet been obtained for the new regiment of dragoons authorized by the act of the last session, and by the vacancies caused by expiration of service, and other casualties, in the other regiments.

2. Distribution and present positions of the troops.—The eastern department, under the command of Major General Scott, includes thirty posts, from twenty of which the troops have been mostly withdrawn for service in the Creek country and in Florida. The whole number of officers of the line, and men, at the several stations in the eastern department, including absentees, is therefore now only 1,124. Of that number, 113 are at Fort Winnebago; 114 at Fort Brady; 105 at Fort Mackinac; 149 at Fort Howard; 67 at Fort Dearborn; 122 at Fort Gratiot; all which posts are on the northwestern frontier, or in that vicinity; and the remainder at posts in the Atlantic States.

The western department, under the command of Major General Gaines, now includes twenty posts; and four temporary stations. Several of these posts have also been evacuated, and the troops ordered to Florida; so that the whole number of officers of the line and men now stationed at them, including absentees, amounts only to 2,458. Of that number, 233 are at Fort Snelling; 185 at Fort Crawford; 321 at Fort Leavenworth; 132 at Fort Gibson; 158 at Fort Towson; 44 at Fort Coffee; 360 at Fort Jesup, and 124 at a station seventy miles from that place; 147 at Camp Sabine, and 428 at Camp Nacogdoches; all which posts and stations are in the northwest, or on or near the western frontier: 176 at Fort Mitchell, Alabama; and 53 at Fort Cass, Tennessee.

The regular force serving in Florida consists of the four regiments of artillery, five companies excepted; eight companies of the fourth regiment of infantry, one company of dragoons, and a battalion of 320 marines; making in the aggregate about 2,000, according to the latest returns received at the Adjutant General's office. After deducting the number reported sick, and absentees, the efficient regular force for field service in Florida will not exceed 1,500.

For want of the necessary returns of the volunteers serving in that quarter, the estimate of that auxiliary force at this time is less accurate; but, from the best data in the Adjutant General's office, it may be thus computed: Tennessee volunteers about 1,200; Alabama volunteers 300; Florida volunteers 250; and Washington City volunteers 59; amounting in all to about 1,800, besides 750 volunteer Creek Indians, who have been mustered into the service of the United States, and are now employed with the army. The whole active force, then, regular, volunteer, and Indians, now in Florida, is probably somewhat less than 4,000.

Besides the volunteers above mentioned, there are also employed of that description of force, 361 in Tennessee, under the command of Brigadier General Wool; 537 in Arkansas, under the command of Brigadier General Arbuckle; and 38 in Alabama; making, when added to those serving in Florida, an aggregate of near 2,800.

3. Movements during the last year, and now in progress.—At the date of the last annual report from this department, several companies had been placed in Florida under the command of Brigadier General Clinch, for the purpose of restraining any hostile intentions on the part of the Seminole Indians, and of enforcing the execution of the treaty providing for their removal. It was then hoped that an open rupture would be prevented; and it was confidently believed that the eleven companies actually in Florida, amounting to 536 officers and men, would be amply sufficient, with the reinforcements then under orders, and with such aid as might be derived from the local militia and volunteers, to put down any hostile attempt which might be made by the disaffected portion of the tribe. Both these expectations were disappointed, and a protracted warfare ensued which has not yet been terminated.

The most important military operations growing out of this state of things are mentioned in the accompanying report of Major General Macomb, which brings down the narrative of events in Florida to the retirement of the forces under Governor Call from the Withlacoochie in October last. Authentic intelligence of that event reached the department on the 1st ultimo, through the medium of letters received by some of the bureaus, and of officers direct from Florida. By the same channels of information, it was also ascertained that the health of Governor Call had been so much impaired by sickness and fatigue, as to make it doubtful whether he could renew the campaign with the promptitude and energy demanded by the crisis. On the 4th ultimo, no report having been received from that officer, and it being necessary that the department should act, without further delay, on the information then in its possession, despatches were sent by express to Governor Call and to Major General Jesup, expressing to the former the surprise and disappointment of the President at the failure of his movement, and calling for an explanation, and directing the latter to assume the command. General Jesup was also instructed to establish posts at or near the mouth of the Withlacoochie, at Fort King, and at Volusia, and, after taking the proper measures for securing through them the safety of the frontier, and for procuring sufficient and regular supplies, to concentrate all his disposable forces, and to proceed without delay to possess himself of the positions occupied by the Indians, and of the whole country between the Withlacoochie and Tampa bay. Should the war thereafter be continued, he was then directed to take such advanced positions to the south of Volusia, and to the east and south of Tampa bay, as the nature of the country might admit, and to push from them such further operations as might be necessary to the most speedy and effectual subjugation of the enemy.

No acknowledgment of the receipt of the despatches of the 4th of November has yet reached the Department; but it is known that Governor Call and General Jesup have both been very actively engaged in preparing for offensive movements; and the latest intelligence gives reason to hope that the objects of the campaign will soon be accomplished. But as these expectations may be disappointed, and as the term of service of the Tennessee volunteers, who compose a very important part of the force serving in Florida, will expire on the 1st of January, it has been deemed important to make provision for supplying their places, in part at least, from the regular army. With this view, the commanding officer of the second regiment of dragoons was directed, on the 26th ultimo, to organize the recruits enlisted for that corps into companies, and to hold them in readiness to be moved to Florida on the shortest notice. It is also expected that two additional companies of artillery may be prepared for the like purpose, during the present month. After maturing these arrangements, information was received at the Department, that General Jesup had recently called on the Governor of Alabama for a battalion, and on the Governor of Georgia for a regiment of volunteers, to meet the contingency of a want of force on the discharge of the Tennessee brigade. This call has been approved as a proper precautionary measure; but it is believed that the other troops now in Florida will be sufficient, especially when reinforced as above suggested, for all available purposes, even should the war be continued; and that the services of the volunteers last called for may therefore very soon be dispensed with.

I beg leave to refer to the report of the General-in-chief for a succinct account of the operations rendered necessary by the hostile movements of the Creek Indians. To that account, however, it is but just to add, that the marine corps, at a very alarming juncture, generously volunteered their services to aid in suppressing those hostilities, and were accordingly employed for that purpose. Since the termination of their tour of duty in the Creek country, they have been moved to Florida, where they now compose a most efficient portion of General Jesup's force.

Indications of a mischievous disposition having been exhibited by the Winnebagoes and their tribes in the northwest, some movement of the troops in the Upper Mississippi were had on the months of July and August last, which produced the desired effect of awing them into quietness.

The movements of the forces under the personal command of Major General Gaines, on the western frontiers of Louisiana and Arkansas, are sufficiently stated in the report of the General-in-chief. General Gaines has recently been relieved of this command by Brigadier General Arbuckle, who was instructed, under date of the 10th of October last, to make a full report of the condition of things in that quarter. He was also particularly advised, that under the instructions previously given to General Gaines, that officer was not to advance into the territory claimed by Mexico, and if he should have advanced, was to retire, unless the Indians were actually engaged in hostilities against the United States, or unless he had undoubted evidence that such hostilities were intended, and were actually in preparation within that territory. On the 11th ultimo, a communication was received from the officer in command at Camp Nacogdoches, giving an unfavorable account of the health of the troops at that post, and stating that their continuance there during the winter would make it necessary to construct barracks and quarters for their comfortable accommodation. In consequence of this communication, Brigadier General Arbuckle was instructed, under date of the 12th ultimo, to take all necessary measures to restore the health of the troops, and in the event of his deciding to retain possession of Camp Nacogdoches, to provide at that place all needful accommodations. He was also informed, that it was not in the power of the Department, with the limited information then in its possession, to give any positive order in regard to the further occupation of the post. The opinion was, however, expressed, that there seemed to be no adequate cause for any longer maintaining a position so unhealthful and inconvenient; and he was instructed, in case he had not already withdrawn the troops, to give the requisite orders for that purpose immediately on the receipt of that communication, unless he should then have in his possession information satisfying him, that the maintenance of the post is essential to the protection of our frontiers, and to the due execution of our treaty stipulations, as explained in the previous instructions to General Gaines and to himself.

In the month of June last, it became necessary to call on the Governor of Tennessee, under the act of the last session, for a volunteer force sufficient to put down any hostile attempt on the part of the disaffected Cherokees, and to insure the peaceful execution of the treaty then lately concluded with that tribe. The command of the troops to be raised for this purpose was committed to Brigadier General Wool, who immediately repaired to the Cherokee country, and is yet in command there. The force under him amounted, at one time, to about 2,450, but has lately been reduced to 361—a number sufficient, from present appearances, to prevent any difficulty in that quarter. Much praise is due to General Wool, for the promptitude and zeal with which he has devoted himself to the execution of his duties.

The whole number of militia and volunteers mustered into the service of the United States, in the various movements and operations above mentioned, appears, from the rolls received in the office of the Adjutant General, to have been about 24,500. In the case of the Tennessee volunteers mustered by General Wool, a larger number appeared than had been called for; but as they acted in good faith, and under patriotic impulses, and as the commanding general deemed it best to receive them, it seems proper that provision should be made for their pay. Legal provision will also be required for the just settlement of many of the accounts growing out of the employment of militia and volunteers; and for the satisfaction of claims which, though equitable, cannot be allowed by the accounting officers.

In executing the first section of the act of the 28th of May last, "to provide for the payment of expenses incurred and supplies furnished on account of the militia or volunteers received into the service of the United States for the defence of Florida," it has been decided that this section does not authorize any allowance for horses or other property impressed into the service of the United States, nor for any special damage done to individuals or their property by the troops of the United States or the enemy. Some of these cases ought undoubtedly to be provided for by Congress; and perhaps, under the peculiar circumstances which attended them, provision should be made for embracing the whole.

In addition to the movements now in progress, already mentioned, the troops stationed at Fort Dearborn, Chicago, have been ordered to proceed to Fort Howard, and to join the garrison at that post, and 75 recruits are on their way to join the first regiment of dragoons at Fort Gibson. The public property at Fort Dearborn will remain in charge of the late commandant of the post.

4. General Staff.—The reports of the chiefs of the different staff departments exhibit a perspicuous view of their operations during the past year.

I beg leave to call your attention to the communication of the Adjutant General, setting forth the difficulties which have been, and are yet experienced in various branches of the public service, for want of additional staff officers.

The fiscal operations of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments have been unusually heavy, in consequence of the hostilities in which the army has been employed. It is due to these two important arms of the service, that I should state that from the time when adequate means were placed at their disposal by Congress, nothing has been omitted on their part to provide the necessary supplies for the troops in the field.

The report of the acting Quartermaster General states the progress made, or rather the inability to make progress, in the construction of the roads, and other works with which the department is charged. It also exposes, in a lucid and convincing manner, the utter insufficiency of this branch of the service, as now organized by law, to the execution of the duties committed to it.

The expenditures incurred during the past year in the emigration and subsistence of Indians, will appear in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whose office that business was transferred by a regulation made on the 1st ultimo. This change was made from a conviction that the interests of the service would be promoted by bringing all matters belonging to any one branch under the care of the bureau to which they properly belonged. The clerks and messengers allowed by law, have been transferred with the business.

The complaints made in the accompanying papers, as to the want of sufficient strength in the staff departments, appear to me to be well founded.

The present system seems to have been framed upon the principle of concentrating the business of those departments at the seat of Government, and of employing therein a very small number of officers commissioned in the staff; the deficiencies being supplied by selections from the lines. This arrangement is very well adapted to a time of profound peace, when officers can be spared from the line without injury to the service; when the positions of the troops are chiefly permanent; and when the changes which occur, are made with so much deliberation as to afford ample time for preparing adequate means of transportation and supply; but when large bodies of troops, whose numbers and movements may be varied by unforeseen contingencies, are to be supplied in the field, and at a great distance from the seat of Government, the system is worse than insufficient; it is the parent of expense, confusion, and delay. During the time necessarily occupied in the transmission of despatches to, and of instructions from, the War Department, the state of things may be so entirely changed as to render the instructions inapplicable; and even if it remain unaltered, the loss of time in military operations is always a great evil, and sometimes a fatal one. To prevent inconveniences of this sort, it is evidently necessary that staff officers of experience and rank should be associated with the commander; and to supply such associates, the staff departments must be enlarged. On the other hand, to make the line of the army truly effective, officers should not be taken for staff service, or other detached duties, in large numbers, nor for long periods, from their companies. And when, to relieve the weakness of the staff, on a pressing emergency, officers are selected from the line, the difficulty, instead of being remedied, is only exchanged for a new, and possibly a greater one. The embarrassments occasioned by these causes, during the operations of the year, have been of constant recurrence, and of the most serious character.

5. Pay Department.—So far as the regular army is concerned, there is nothing in the report of the Paymaster General demanding particular remark. His suggestions, in regard to the services and responsibilities of the paymasters who have been, or who may be, employed in making payments to militia and volunteers, undoubtedly demand the attention of Congress. In order to a clear understanding of this subject, it should be observed, that after the reduction of the army on the conclusion of the late war, and until the act of July 14th, 1832, the Secretary of War appears, in several instances, to have exercised the power of making discretionary allowances to paymasters of the army of the United States, for the risks and losses sustained by them in making payments to militia and volunteers. These allowances were made in the shape of commissions on the money paid, and were usually fixed at two and a half per cent. The only ground on which such a power could have been exercised, was the absence of any legislative provision making it a part of the regular duty of the army paymasters to make payments to militia and volunteers. But by the third section of the act of the 14th July, 1832, it was made the duty of the district paymasters of the army of the United States, "in addition to the payments required to be made by them to the regular troops, to make payment to all other troops in the service of the United States whenever required thereto by order of the President." The discretionary power before possessed by the Secretary of War to make an extra allowance for payments to the militia and volunteers, was, as I suppose, taken away by this provision; and it was doubtless in consequence of this change, that the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1833, expressly provided, "that the Secretary of War be authorized, at his discretion, out of the moneys appropriated by this or any former act, for the payment of the militia ordered into the service of the United States according to law, during the last year, to allow and pay to the district paymasters of the army of the United States, employed in making such payments, a commission on the sums respectively paid by them, not exceeding one per centum upon the amounts."

The act of the 14th of January, 1836, making appropriations for the suppression of hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians, provides "that the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense attending the suppression of hostilities with the Seminole Indians in Florida; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the provisions of the act of April 5th, 1832, 'making appropriations for the support of the army;'" and the same reference is in effect made in the subsequent acts. When the act of the 5th of April, 1832, thus referred to, was passed, the discretionary power spoken of above, was possessed by the Secretary of War, and was exercised in the settlement of the paymasters' accounts under that act, by the allowance of a commission of two and a half per cent. In a case of peculiar hardship, and of just merit also, which occurred before the resignation of the late Secretary of War, the Paymaster General, under the impression that the general reference to the act of the 5th of April, 1832, contained in the acts of the last session, included authority to allow a per centage, recommended such an allowance to the extent of one per cent. The Secretary of War referred the case to me as Attorney General, and called for my opinion as to the power of the department to allow the proposed commission. My opinion was, that the discretionary power was taken away by the act of 1832, above quoted, and also by the act of the 3d of March, 1833, making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater and other works, and that the intent to confer such a power was not sufficiently apparent in the general reference to the act of 1832, to authorize the allowance applied for. But as it would seem, from the report of the Paymaster General, that justice requires that additional compensation should be allowed, I concur in recommending a special provision, similar to that inserted in the act of the 2d of March, 1833.

6. Medical Department.—The number of cases treated by the officers of the medical department, during the year ending the 30th of September last, was 14,356; of which number only 139 died. This result may well be taken as evidence of the professional skill of the surgeons and assistant surgeons, and of the care with which their duties are performed. For other matters respecting this department, I beg leave to refer to the report of the Surgeon General ad interim. His suggestions in regard to the pay of hospital stewards, and the repairing and erection of hospitals at the different military posts, appear to me to be worthy the attention of Congress.

7. Purchasing Department.—The report of the Commissary General of Purchases exhibits the several amounts drawn and disbursed for clothing, camp equipage, &c. during the present year, with estimates for the like service for the year 1837.

8. Engineers, and Topographical Engineers.—The reports of the Chief Engineer, and of the head of the Topographical Bureau, exhibit the progress made during the last year upon the fortifications and other works under their care.

The failure, during the session of 1834-5, of the bill containing the usual appropriations for fortifications, occasioned a suspension of those works during the year 1835; and though liberal appropriations for resuming them were made at the last session of Congress, yet it unfortunately happened, that the season for active operations was too far advanced at the time of the passing of the appropriation laws, to allow of much progress during the present year. Operations have been also retarded by the difficulty of procuring laborers, and still more by the insufficiency of the Engineer Department to furnish an adequate number of engineers to superintend the constructions. Several important works, authorized at the last session, have not even been commenced, and but little has been done towards the completion of those previously undertaken. The like remarks are applicable to the various improvements in harbors on the seaboard and lakes, and at the mouths and in the channels of navigable rivers.

From the causes above stated, but a small portion of the sums appropriated by the present Congress for the engineer and topographical service has yet been expended. The balances of those appropriations may, however, be expended without any further law; and measures will be taken for resuming operations at an early day, and with all practicable vigor.

In the last annual report of the Secretary of War, he stated the insufficiency of the corps of engineers, and of the topographical corps, to the expeditious and economical performance of the duties committed to them, and recommended their increase. His suggestions on this subject were approved by you, and the attention of Congress was invited to them in your message. The propriety of such a measure is greatly strengthened by the present condition of those branches of the service, and by the delays and embarrassments occasioned by a want of the necessary force. In connection with the proposed reorganization of the topographical corps, it may well be questioned, whether the existing arrangement as to the civil engineers attached to that corps, and the practice of lending the topographical engineers to the States, and to incorporated companies, ought longer to be continued. In my judgment, it would be better that all the engineers in the service of the United States should belong to one or other of the organized military corps. And the information derived from the services of engineers when employed by the States, or by companies, though useful in a military point of view, does not seem to me sufficiently important to counterbalance the inconveniences and objections incident to the practice.

9. Ordnance Department.—It appears from the report of the Colonel of Ordnance, that $387,570 45 have been expended and accounted for during the first three quarters of the present year, being about $207,000 more than was expended in the same service during the corresponding quarters of the year 1835. These moneys have been expended in the manufacture, repair, and purchase of ordnance, ordnance stores, small arms; and accoutrements, and in building materials; the details of all which will appear by the statements annexed to Colonel Bomford's report.

During the year ending on the 30th of September, 1836, the sum of $220,813 38 was expended in procuring and distributing artillery, small arms, accoutrements, &c. under the act of 1808 for arming and equipping the militia of the States and Territories.

The munitions of war, issued during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1836, have been very large, in consequence of the actual hostilities in which the army has been engaged.

No returns of lead made at the United States lead mines have been delivered to the superintendent during the last year; and there yet remains due to the United States, on account of rent lead which accrued prior to the 30th September, 1835, an aggregate of 495,313 pounds. It appears, that the refusal to account for, and to pay over, the rent reserved in the leases, mentioned in the last annual report, has become general—the lessees denying the validity of the laws under which the leases were made; and that suits have been commenced against several of the delinquents, but are not yet determined. Colonel Bomford recommends the selling of the mineral lands, as the most effectual mode of terminating the difficulties now existing between the Government and the inhabitants, and of securing to the United States the value of the mines.

Of the works authorized by acts passed at the last session of Congress, and belonging to the Ordnance Department, all have been greatly delayed, and some entirely suspended, by the want of the necessary officers to conduct them. The interests of the service, as well as the just claims of contractors, whose payments are frequently delayed from inability to make the proper inspections, call loudly for an increase of this corps.

10. Proposed increase in rank and file of artillery and infantry.—In compliance with the suggestion of General Macomb, and with my own convictions of duty, I beg leave to invite your attention to a proposal for the increase of the rank and file of the artillery and infantry.

The insufficiency, in several respects, of our present military establishment, has already been noticed. It is greatest in the general staff and the rank and file; those arms of the service being much less numerous, in proportion, than the officers retained in the line of the army. The object of Congress in this arrangement evidently was, on the one hand, to reduce the rank and file and the general staff to the lowest allowable point; and on the other, to retain in the line officers enough to preserve an amount of military knowledge and experience competent to the direction of a larger effective force, whenever such a force might be required by special emergencies, or by the permanent interests of the country. This policy was recommended, at the time of its adoption, (1821,) by the existence of other and more pressing claims on the Treasury, and by the comparatively few calls then made for active military operations. In both these respects, our condition is now widely different. The extinction of the public debt, whilst it gives us the ability to attend to other subjects of national importance, lays us under new obligations to do so. We have a much larger number of fortifications and other posts to be garrisoned; and our Indian relations have now reached a point which demands an effective military provision. There are thirty-two forts on the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, each of which ought to be garrisoned by a force adequate, at least, to the preservation of the public property, and to the retaining of some knowledge of artillery practice. This will require, as I understand, an average of about ninety-six men to each post, or about three thousand in the whole. The rank and file of the present regular army, supposing the new regiment of dragoons to be filled, amounts, in the total, to seven thousand and sixteen: from which number a large deduction must always be made for sickness, arrests, occasional absence, and time lost in recruiting and marching. The effective force, exclusive of officers, which may be relied on under the present arrangement, can, therefore, scarcely ever exceed six thousand men; a force utterly inadequate to the necessities of the public service, inasmuch as it affords, after the scanty provision for the seaboard above suggested, only about three thousand for the interior.

In that part of this report which relates to Indian affairs, I shall have occasion to specify some of the weighty reasons which make it necessary that we should establish additional posts on our western borders and in the Indian country; and that each should be permanently garrisoned by a respectable force. We have now in that region sixteen posts, including three temporary stations, the whole of which are now occupied by about three thousand men, including a regiment of Arkansas volunteers recently called into the service. All, probably, will agree, that the present force at several of the existing posts is inadequate; and a deliberate survey of the immense field of operations, and of the various interests involved, will, I think, lead to the conclusion, that this branch of the service cannot safely be left, for the next five or ten years, with a force at any time less than from five to seven thousand men.

The seaboard may be provided for in the manner above suggested, and adequate protection may be given to the interior, and to the Indian country, by augmenting the number of men in each company of artillery and infantry to one hundred. This would increase the legal force, independently of commissioned officers and non-commissioned officers of artillery and infantry, to twelve thousand and thirty; from which we might at all times expect to command an available force of not more than about ten thousand effective men. Two plans for a similar increase in the rank and file of the army were submitted to Congress in the report of the Secretary of War of the 8th of March, 1836, and the accompanying communication of Gen. Macomb, of the 7th of that month; both of which communications were laid before the Senate of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of that body. I refer to these documents for the details of those plans, and for an estimate of the expense, which, according to the statements then made, would be, for the increase above proposed, about $850,000 per annum. Such an addition to the heavy expenses of our present establishment should undoubtedly be well weighed before it is incurred; but if we may judge from the experience of the last few years, the measure is as plainly called for on the score of economy, as it is by other and more impressive considerations. The expenses occasioned by the hostile aggressions of the Sac and Fox Indians in 1832 amounted to more than three millions of dollars; and the several appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, made by Congress at the last session, and amounting to five millions of dollars, have already been drawn from the Treasury; and though a considerable amount is yet in the hands of disbursing officers, the whole will be required to meet expenses already incurred.

If it be one of the first objects of legislation to guard against the evils of war, then must it be admitted, that the prevention of Indian hostilities, so far as human foresight is competent to that end, should be the great care of the Congress of the United States. For whilst our exposure to such hostilities is imminent, the evils which attend them are so peculiar and unmitigated, as to bring on those public agents who may neglect to guard against them the most fearful responsibility. The presence of an adequate military force at or near each of the points where the Indians are numerous, is the most effectual, if not the only effectual, means of security and defence. In my judgment, such a force cannot be furnished by our present establishment; and as neither militia nor volunteers can be employed for permanent garrisons, the object can only be effected by the increase of the regular army. I trust it will be provided for without delay.

11. Proposed revision of the pay of certain officers.—My attention having been called, by repeated resignations and other circumstances, to the pay of the subordinate grades, I have looked into the subject with some care, and the result is, a decided conviction that the pay of the several grades above that of second lieutenant, and below that of colonel, ought to be increased; and that a new principle of periodical increase in each grade ought also to be introduced.

By the law as it now stands, there is no increase of the fixed pay and emoluments, except when the officer is promoted; and as promotion in time of peace is generally very slow, officers may serve over ten years in a single grade, and, after a ser-age of twenty or thirty years, may still rise no higher than a majority, or even a captaincy. On the other hand, it will occasionally happen that resignations or other casualties may produce numerous vacancies within a comparatively short period in particular regiments, which may lead to rapid promotions; so that a second lieutenant may, within three or four years after entering the service, be advanced to a captaincy. To remedy the inadequacy of the present system when promotion is slow, and to prevent its inequality when its movement in particular regiments is rapid, it has occurred to me, that it would be expedient and just to introduce the additional feature of increasing the pay after five years' service in any one grade, agreeably to the precedents established by the act of 1834, in relation to surgeons and assistant surgeons of the army, and by the act of 1835, regulating the pay of surgeons in the navy. Concomitantly with the introduction of this principle, I would also revise the scale of pay and emoluments, with a view to a moderate increase of the different grades above that of second lieutenant and under that of colonel.

I think it would be just to allow to second lieutenants, for the first five years from the dates of their commissions, the present pay and emoluments of their grade; and to those who have been in commission over five years, the present pay and emoluments of the first lieutenant; to first lieutenants, for the first five years, the present pay and emoluments of a captain; and to those who have been commissioned over five years, a corresponding increase; and in like manner to provide for an increase in the pay of those captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels, who shall have been in commission over five years, taking care, however, in all cases, that the increase by means of five years' service in one grade, shall not be more than one-half the difference between the first pay of such grade and the first pay of the next grade. The effect of this double arrangement for increase of compensation would be to secure to the officer the certainty of an increase of pay at periodical stages, corresponding to the probable increase in his wants, and in the value of his services. But it would not interfere with the ancient and just practice of increasing the pay of the officer, on his advancement to a higher grade. When promotions are slow, the principle is greatly needed, and then it would apply, when they are rapid, it would not be needed, and would not take place.

As the pay, emoluments, and allowances now given by law, depend on the grade of the officer, the corps to which he belongs, and his particular position and circumstances, the attempt to state them in this place would lead to inconvenient prolixity, and should you think proper to submit the subject to Congress, the proper information can be laid before the committee of that body. It is, however, deserving of consideration, whether the principle adopted in the act of 1835, regulating the pay of the navy, by which all allowances (except for travelling expenses when under orders) are prohibited, and a gross sum in lieu thereof added to the pay, may not, to some extent at least, be advantageously followed. The whole subject undoubtedly demands revision, especially with a view to retain in the departments of engineering, and other branches requiring scientific attainments of a high order, experienced and valuable officers. Several of that class have retired from the army during the year, induced, as I have reason to suppose, by the inadequacy of the existing compensation, and the great demand for their services in civil life.

12. Proposed increase in the pay of privates—land bounty on re-enlistments.—I think it highly expedient that the pay of privates should also be increased. They are now allowed, when serving as cavalry in the regiments of dragoons, eight dollars per month; in all other cases, six dollars per month. No bounty is given, except on a second enlistment, which is encouraged by a gratuity of two months' pay. In consequence of the great increase in the price of labor, it has been found difficult during the last year, to procure able-bodied men to supply the places of those soldiers whose term of service had expired, and the recruiting of the second regiment of dragoons; and to fill up vacancies in the other regiments, goes on very slowly. I submit whether it be not advisable to increase the regular pay; and as the services of an experienced and disciplined soldier are far more valuable than those of a new recruit, I cannot doubt the propriety of increasing the bounty on re-enlistment. It might be granted in land, at less inconvenience to the Government, than if paid in money, and would probably be equally acceptable to the soldier. And as the service of the army, for some years to come, will be chiefly on our western frontiers, most of the men, when discharged in that region, would probably find it for their interest to become actual settlers. The policy of the Government in regard to the disposition of the public lands, would thus be promoted; and the settlers whom this arrangement would plant on the frontiers, would be found, from their military knowledge, among the most useful of their class. These objects might be still further promoted, by giving an increased quantity of land on the condition of actual settlement.

13. Proposal for the employment of Chaplains.—Some provision, as it appears to me, should be made for securing to the army the services of chaplains. The act of April 12, 1808, required one chaplain, with the pay and emoluments of a major of infantry, to be appointed to each brigade. This provision was continued in force until superseded by the act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment; and there is now no authority for employing such an officer in the army at the public expense, except at the Military Academy.

The constitution of the United States has wisely provided, that Congress "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" but this cannot lessen the obligation of Congress to furnish to the officers and men employed in the military service, such opportunities of religious worship and of moral culture, as may be compatible with the appropriate duties of the army. And when it is considered that even the common soldier resumes, sooner or later, the character of a citizen, how important does it become, that he should be shielded, as much as possible, from the pernicious influences to which a military life is usually exposed? The enlightening and tranquilizing effects of a regular attendance on public worship, and the aid which a judicious and devoted chaplain may give in the promotion of discipline and subordination, ought not to be overlooked in the organization of an army.

Since 1815, the services of chaplains at the fixed posts have frequently been secured by voluntary contributions, collected and applied, as I understand, by the council of administration. As the officers composing that council will be enabled to consult the wishes of the garrison, and are in other respects better qualified to make judicious selections for services of this nature than the authorities at the seat of Government, I recommend the passage of a law, authorizing them to select and employ chaplains from time to time, and giving to the persons so employed the pay and emoluments of such grade as Congress may think proper to prescribe. To each regiment, when employed in the field, the like arrangement might be extended.

14. General condition of the army, &c.—The vacancies in the rank and file being numerous, and many officers of the line being engaged on detached service, or absent with leave, or on furlough, the army, though in a high state of discipline, has not been found in the fittest condition for active field service. And notwithstanding the successive orders which have been issued, directing officers to join their regiments, the deficiency in officers, has not yet been supplied—many having resigned, and others being so situated, by reason of sickness or other causes, as to make a suspension of the orders in respect to them unavoidable. These circumstances, however, only enhance the merits of the officers and men, whether regulars, marines, militia, or volunteers, who have encountered the difficulties, privations, and perils of field service, on the western frontier and in the south.

Several instances have occurred during the war with the Seminoles, in which our troops have nobly sustained the honor of the American name; and those who will dispassionately consider the events of the past year, will find, in the services of the army, many strong claims on the confidence and gratitude of the nation.

The general-in-chief has noticed in his report, and in appropriate terms, the gallantry and good conduct of Brigadier General Clinch, who commanded in Florida on the breaking out of hostilities in that quarter. The merits of that officer were so highly appreciated by this department, that his resignation was not accepted until it had been ascertained to have been rendered necessary by important private affairs. In consequence, doubtless, of pending inquiries, General Macomb's report intimates no opinion as to the conduct or operations of any other general officer in Florida, or in the Creek country. This forbearance was manifestly proper, and will be imitated by the department. But it is not inconsistent with the rule thus adopted, to express the hope, that it may ultimately appear that nothing has occurred to justify permanent estrangement between soldiers who trod together the path of renown, nor to dim the lustre of those honorable services, which each has rendered to his country.

II. MILITIA AND VOLUNTEERS.

It has already been stated, that within the last year no less than about 24,500 militia and volunteers have been mustered into the service of the United States. As these forces, when in actual service, form a part of the army of the United States, such particulars concerning those employed during the year, as seemed proper to be noticed in this report, have been presented under the preceding head.

The defective organization of the militia was noticed at length in the last annual report of the Secretary of War; and the outlines were suggested of a plan for its improvement, which received your sanction, and was submitted to Congress in the opening message of the last session. No legislative action having been had upon the subject, I deem it my duty to invite it to your renewed attention. If any arguments, in addition to those heretofore urged, were needed on this point, they would be found in the experience of the last year. Whilst the calls on the militia have been answered in a manner highly honorable to their patriotism, they have led to new illustrations of their deficiencies and organization and discipline. The matter has very often been presented to the consideration of Congress: and until the constitutional power of organizing, arming, and disciplining this arm of national defence shall have been more adequately exercised, it will continue to be a duty to invoke their enlightened interposition.

III. FORTIFICATIONS, ARSENALS, ROADS, &c.

The present condition of our fortifications, arsenals, and other works of public defence, will sufficiently appear by reference to the accompanying documents from the Engineer and Ordnance Departments; and the elaborate and very able report of the late Secretary of War, of the 7th of April last, transmitted to the Senate with your message of the following day, contains so full a view of the measures proper to be taken for their completion and armament, as to make any further observations on that point superfluous in this place. I would, however, particularly invite your attention, and also that of Congress, to the proposals contained in that paper, and in the last annual report, for the establishment of a national foundry for cannon, and to the suggestions on the subject of depots for arms, then also submitted.

The reports of the Chief Engineer, and of the head of the Topographical Bureau, must also be referred to, for a succinct account of the present condition of the Cumberland, and other roads, and of the harbors, and other improvements authorized by law.

IV. MILITARY ACADEMY AT WEST POINT.

The report of the Board of Visitors, giving the results of the last annual examination, is well calculated to confirm the favorable opinion so generally entertained, in respect to this institution: it also states some facts which, it may be hoped, will remove some of these misapprehensions which have occasionally prevailed to the prejudice of that establishment.

By the existing law, each cadet, on his appointment, is required to sign articles by which he engages to serve five years and, as soon as discharged, for four years of this term, by the regulations in force since 1819; are to be spent at the academy the engagement secures to the United States only one year's service after graduation. It appears, however, from the reports of the Veters, that out of 841 graduates, the total number from the commencement of the institution, only 65 had resigned at the end of their term of enlistment. The Veters also ascertain, that out of the same number, 4/3 still remained in the army; and that of the others, 15 had been killed in battle, and 166 had otherwise died in the service. These facts illustrate the value of the institution as one of the effective means of providing for the national defence.

Whilst it thus appears that the public service has not been materially prejudiced by the early termination of the law, it is not difficult to think that its interests should be more effectively secured. In my judgment, the engagement for service after graduation should be considerably prolonged; and the graduate should be made liable by law, in case of his discharge short of the prescribed term, for neglect of duty or other misconduct, to pay to the Government an equivalent for the expense incurred in his education and support. Such a provision would not only be just in itself, but seems due to other considerations. As there is no constitutional authority to maintain the institution, except as a part of the military establishment necessary to the defence of the country, it should be so regulated as to contribute directly to that end. Such, too, seems to have been the design of the act of 1812, in prescribing the curriculum of the course. There was at that time no prescribed term of study; and as the progress of the cadet on his entire term was regulated by the extent of his attainments, he might, and as I understand, usually did, complete his course in about two years. It was, therefore, intended by the act of 1812, that there was at that time no service should be secured, equivalent, in some measure, to the expense incurred by the Government. I recommend the re-assertion of this principle in a new enactment, adapted to the changes since made in the term of study.

The Board of Veters having submitted various propositions for the enlargement of the public buildings, and of the courses of instruction, I have denied it due to the subject, as well as to the high character of the board, to present their suggestions to your consideration and to that of Congress. They are accordingly embraced in the estimates made by the Chief Engineer, with a single exception, which could not be submitted in that form. The recommendation thus excepted, relates to the duties of the chaplain. By the second section of the act of the 14th of April, 1818, it is provided, that there shall be a chaplain at the Military Academy at West Point, "who shall also be professor of geography, history, and ethics." To assist the chaplain in the duties of his professorship, an officer of the army has been associated with him, and the two instruct in the branches above named, and also in grammar and rhetoric, and in the elements of political science, including the law of nations and the constitutional law of the United States. It has been found physically impossible for the chaplain to give adequate attention to his clerical duties, and, with the aid of his assistant, to instruct in the various studies above named. The consequence is, that the religious instruction of the cadets receives less attention than is commensurate with its importance, and with the probable intent of the act of Congress. The Veters therefore recommend, and the suggestion makes me as important, either that the functions of the chaplain be separated from those of the professor, or that another assistant be provided to aid him in the professorship. The latter mode of relief may be extended by Executive regulation; but the former is deemed most appropriate, and for that reason the interpolation of Congress is solicited.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, herewith laid before you, embraces a detailed account of the operations of his office during the past year.

It appears from that document, that within this period, more than eighteen thousand Indians, of which 10,000 were Seminoles, and the remainder more than nine hundred Creeks, and the remainder Potawatamies, have reached the west bank of the Mississippi, on their way to their new homes; and that arrangements have been made for the removal of the residue of those tribes, at an early day as circumstances shall allow. The same process of removal has been conducted with greater expedition, as much economy, and as little of suffering and privation to the Indians, as in former years; but the opposition made by the hostile portions of the Seminoles and Creeks, already mentioned, to a former head, has subjected the Government, in those cases, to the painful necessity of resorting to coercive measures, which, in respect to the Seminoles, are yet continued.

The same report also exhibits the progress made by the Commissioner in the execution of the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 1st of July, 1836, requesting the President of the United States "that measures be taken for the investigation and removal of the frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the control of their hostilities." The investigation, thus directed, have necessarily suspended the action of the Executive on many contracts for the sale of Creek reservations; and there are also other difficulties in respect to them, which will probably require the intervention of Congress.

A Commissioner has recently been appointed to certify to me, and to take proof of the ratification of the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, and has probably executed on the day of his arrival.

The provisions in the treaties of 1832 and 1834 with the Chickasaws, which are to be carried into effect before their removal, have been nearly completed; and an arrangement, it is hoped, will soon be concluded between them, and the Choctaws west of the Mississippi, for a portion of the territory assigned to the act.

Measures have been taken for fulfilling the engagements of the United States contained in the treaties with the Chickasaws and Ottawas, the Shaw, Creek, and Red River bands of the Chickasaws, and the Wyandots, ratified at the last session of the Senate; and, so far as all will by the short time which has since elapsed, those engagements have been faithfully executed.

Immediately after the ratification of the treaty with the Chickasaws east of the Mississippi, the obligatory measures for carrying it into effect were taken by the Department; and though much retarded by various unforeseen occurrences, they are now going on with all the despatch of which the case is susceptible. The military movements deemed necessary to the maintenance of peace, and to the enforcement of the treaty, have already been noticed. Efforts have recently been made by Mr. John Ross, and by those of his people of whom he is understood to be the leader, to excite opposition to the treaty, and to prevent its execution; but it is believed that the steps taken by the Government will be sufficient to counteract these efforts. The more intelligent part of the Chickasaws are well satisfied with the treaty; and the prompt and faithful execution, on our part, of the obligations of the Government, resulting from the good will of the great mass of the nation, and the issue in their peaceful establishment with their brethren in the west.

Treaties have been made with the Indians who have emigrated from New York to Green Bay, the lands on both sides of Fox river; and with the chiefs of the Potawatamies residing in the State of Indiana, for the extinguishment of their title to the sections of lands reserved for them in the treaties of October, 1832. Negotiations have also been commenced with the Indians of New York for the extinguishment of their title to lands in that State, and for their removal to the west of the Mississippi. With a view to the extinguishment of the Indian title to the country between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river, negotiations were opened with the tribes interested therein for the relinquishment of their rights; and treaties to that effect have already been concluded with the Ioways and Sacs of Missouri, Ottawas, Yanktons and Santee Sioux, and Ottos and Missouries. Measures have also been taken for opening negotiations with the united nation of Ottawas, Chippewas, and Potawatamies, for an exchange of the lands north of the Missouri river assigned to them by the treaty of Chicago of 1833, for lands south of that river; and with the Micmacs, for a cession of their lands in Indiana.

The Commissioner points out several defects in the laws relative to Indian Affairs; and for the purpose of pointing out these defects, submits various propositions, to which, I beg leave to call your attention, as worthy of being presented to the consideration of Congress. He also recommends the removal of the seat of the superintendency of Indian Affairs from St. Louis, where it is now fixed by law, to Fort Leavenworth, or some other point on the Missouri river; and the substitution of full agencies for the present sub-agencies of the Creeks, Chickasaws, and Ottawas, as measures rendered necessary by the enormous nature of the duties now pressing upon the Commissioner of those offices, and of the great accessions recently made, and hereafter to be made, to the tribes west of the Mississippi.

From the facts stated by the Commissioner, it would seem that the proviso to the act of the 3d of March, 1835, which requires that the Delaware breakwater, &c. operates harshly on the military officers in the Indian Department. I concur in the propriety of asking from Congress, as an act of justice to those officers, the allowance of a commission on disbursements, as recommended by the Commissioner.

Connected with the general subject of our Indian relations, are two measures proposed by the Commissioner, which I deem of great moment. They are the organization of an efficient system for the protection and removal of the Indian country west of the Mississippi, and the establishment of military posts for the protection of that country and of our own frontiers, in addition to those now authorized by law.

These measures are due to the numerous tribes whom we have planted in this extensive territory, and to the pledges and encouragements by which they were induced to consent to a change of residence. We may now be said to have consummated the policy of emigration; and to have entered on an era of peace and tranquillity. It involves the last pledge of humanity in respect to the Indian tribes; and though, to the United States, these issues cannot be equally momentous, they yet deeply concern our property and honor. It is therefore behooves us, at this juncture, seriously to examine the relations which exist between the United States and the inhabitants of the Indian country, to look into the duties which devolve on us, and to mature a system of measures for their just and constant execution.

In almost every treaty providing for the emigration of an Indian tribe, the impossibility of observing it from extinction, if left within the limits of any of the States, or organized Territories of the United States, and thus exposed to the advances of the white population, is expressly recognized. The advantages which the Indians derive from its establishment in a territory to be exclusively occupied by red men, and the solemn guarantees and the paternal care of the United States, are uniformly insisted on. In the treaty with the Choctaws of the 27th of September, 1830, the wish of the tribes to be allowed the privilege of a delegate in the House of Representatives of the United States is expressly mentioned; and though not accorded to by the commissioners of the United States, yet they insert it in the treaty, "that Congress may, at any time, and at its discretion, decide to admit a delegate from the tribe." In the Cherokee act of the Mississippi, it is expressly stipulated "that they shall be entitled to a delegate in the House of Representatives, whenever Congress shall make provision for the same." It is not to be doubted, that the hopes thus held out to these tribes had an important influence in determining them to consent to emigrate to their new homes in the west.

Although some of the Indians have made considerable advances in civilization, they all need the guardianship of the United States. To leave them to the barbarism of their own institutions, with the inadequate assistance of an agent, and the slight control of the general superintendent, would be imprudent as it regards ourselves, and unjust towards them. Under such a system, hostilities will frequently break out between the different tribes, and sometimes between them and the inhabitants of our frontiers, attended in both cases by the usual consequences of savage warfare. To fulfil, in their true spirit, the engagements into which we have entered, we must institute a comprehensive system of guardianship, adapted to the circumstance, and wants of the people, and calculated to lead them, gradually and safely, to the exercise of self-government; and at as early a day as circumstances will allow, the expectations authorized by the passages above quoted from the treaties with the Choctaws and Cherokees, should be fulfilled. Indeed, from the facts stated by the Commissioner, it is scarcely to be doubted that the Choctaws are already in a condition to justify the measure. The daily presence of a native delegate on the floor of the House of Representatives of the United States, presenting, as occasion may require, to that dignified assembly, the interests of his people, would, more than any other single act, attest to the world and to the Indian tribes the sincerity of our endeavors for their preservation and happiness. In the successful issue of those endeavors, we shall find a more precious and durable accession to the glory of our country, than by any triumph we can achieve in arts or in arms.

The duty of planting a line of posts near the borders of the Indian country, and of opening along it a free communication for the passage of troops, has already been recognised by the present Congress, by the act of the 2d of July, 1836, "to provide for the better protection of the western frontier." This law authorizes the President to cause to be opened a military road, from some point upon the right bank of the Mississippi, between the mouth of the St. Peters and the mouth of the Des Moines, to Red river, and it contemplates the establishment of military posts at such places along said road, as the President may deem most proper for the protection of the frontier; and for the preservation of the necessary communication. But this line of posts, though it will probably be sufficient, if well garrisoned, to protect our own frontier, will not be all that caution and good faith will require. To exercise the necessary supervision over the emigrated Indians, to preserve peace among the different tribes, and to protect them from their savage neighbors, we must also establish posts at convenient positions in the interior of their country.

The establishment and maintenance of these various posts is due to the emigrant tribes for other reasons. By the most sacred pledges, the territory in which we have planted them is to be perpetually theirs; the white man, with certain specified exceptions, is not to reside among them. These pledges have been given in the utmost sincerity; and the American people cannot but desire that they should be honorably redeemed. Without a strong military force—a force adequate to repress the encroachments of the civilized and more powerful race—how can we hope for their fulfilment? In the history of the Indian tribes from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, and, indeed, in the history of barbarians in every quarter of the globe, when pressed upon by a civilized population, we may read the issue of these pledges, unless we take early and efficient measures for their fulfilment. These measures must be such as will arrest the causes which in all other cases have ended in the extinction of the weaker race. The operation of those causes cannot be controlled by parchment guarantees or mere moral considerations; to resist and counteract them, a physical force must be employed, sufficiently powerful and vigilant to keep them constantly in check. To my view, nothing is clearer than the ultimate failure of the great experiment we have commenced with the emigrated Indians, unless we secure to them, by military protection, the place and the time for the fair trial of that experiment. If we leave them unprotected, they will fade away as other tribes have faded; and the process, as in their cases, will be diversified by the same sanguinary events. The only difference will be, that as the Indians on our western frontiers are concentrated in greater force than has ever before been known in the history of the race, their inroads, if not more frequent, will probably be more terrible and disastrous than any which have yet occurred.

When it is considered that the emigration of the present year includes great numbers recently engaged in open hostilities, and that, besides these, there are probably many others who cherish unfriendly feelings, though never manifested in overt acts, is it unreasonable to suppose that they will seize the first favorable opportunity to gratify the strongest of savage passions, and to re-enact the scenes which have so recently been exhibited in the south? From them, and from the events yet passing before us, we may learn how much of individual suffering and of national calamity may be occasioned by even a small Indian force, organized by stealth, and acting with characteristic quickness and ferocity. If those events shall only teach us to provide, by wise forecast, against the recurrence of any such event, as well as to fulfil our plighted faith to the tribes now settled in the west, that I have felt it my duty to enforce at such length, the views presented by the Commissioner.

VI. PENSIONS, ETC.

The sums paid to pension agents for disbursements during the current year, amount to $2,699,430 66, viz:

For paying invalid pensioners	$276,450 00
For paying revolutionary pensioners under the act of March 18, 1818	675,112 66
For paying pensioners under the act of June 7, 1832, including payments made in 135 cases allowed under the act of July 4, 1836	1,563,376 00
For paying pensioners under the act of May 15, 1828	137,320 00
For paying claims under the act of July 5, 1832, granting half pay to the officers of the Virginia State troops	47,172 00

the particulars of which will appear by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and the accompanying tables.

Under the act of the 4th of July last, granting half pay to widows and orphans in certain cases, 436 claims have been presented, of which 135 have been admitted, and 22 rejected. The remainder had not yet received official decision. The payments already made under this act, have been from the standing appropriation made by the act of June 7, 1832; but it would seem to be more appropriate that they should be specially provided for, and an estimate for that purpose will accordingly be submitted.

It is observed by General Macomb, and also by the Commissioner of Pensions, in their reports, that the existing pension laws do not extend to the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers of the regular army all the benefits now enjoyed by the widows of officers and soldiers in other branches of the service. This arises from the circumstance that the first section of the act of the 4th of July last is expressly confined to the widows and orphans of persons who served as militia or volunteers. I concur in the suggestion that this difference ought to be removed. The third section of this law has been construed to apply to those widows only whose husbands died before its passage. As this construction, though demanding by the words employed, makes a distinction in the operation of the law which may not have been designed, it is perhaps worthy of being submitted to the attention of Congress.

It appears from the accompanying report of the operations of the Bounty Land Office, that 876 claims for services rendered in the revolutionary war, and 692 for services rendered during the last war, were presented during the year ending the 30th of September last; and that of the former, 40, and of the latter and similar claims, previously presented and suspended, 128, were allowed.

VII. FISCAL CONCERNS OF THE DEPARTMENT.

To exhibit at one view a summary of the various fiscal operations of this department, during the year 1836, I have caused to be prepared the tabular statement, marked A, hereunto annexed, to which I beg leave respectfully to refer.

It appears from that document, that on the first day of January, 1836, the various sums then under the control of the department, as unexpended balances of former appropriations, or by virtue of the standing appropriations made by the revolutionary pension and claims acts of May 15, 1828; June 7, 1832, and July 5, 1832, and the acts of April 23, 1808, and April 29, 1816, for arming and equipping the militia, amounted in the aggregate to $5,675,746 12.

The estimates made by this department for the service of 1836, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him laid before Congress at the commencement of the last session, amounted to $8,393,282 49, making, when added to the above sum of $5,675,746 12, an aggregate of $14,069,028 61, which was all then supposed by the department to be required for the service of 1836, on account of the objects then authorized by law. But in consequence of the military operations which became necessary during the session, the conclusion of the treaty with the Cherokees and other Indian tribes, and the various increased or new expenditures directed by Congress, there was appropriated at the last session, for the service of this department, an aggregate of $23,242,331 28; being an excess of appropriations over the estimates of $14,849,048 79, and making, when added to the unexpended balances and standing appropriations above mentioned, the sum of $28,918,077 40, applicable to the service of 1836, and liable to be drawn out of the Treasury during the year, if needed for disbursement—although it was doubtless known, when the appropriations were made, that in many cases only portions thereof would be so needed during the year.

During the first three quarters of the year 1836, there was drawn from the Treasury, and placed in the hands of disbursing officers, the aggregate amount of $13,514,456 27; the expenditure of which, so far as the accounts have been rendered and settled, will appear by the reports of the several bureaus, and of the accounting officers, hereunto annexed.

It is estimated that the expenditures which will be made during the fourth quarter of 1836 will amount to $6,807,626 92. In this sum is included all that remained at the end of the third quarter of the different appropriations, amounting to $5,000,000, made during the last session for the suppression, or prevention, of Indian hostilities. Indeed, those appropriations have already been expended, or drawn from the Treasury and placed in the hands of disbursing officers for expenditure.

Should the expenditures of the fourth quarter of 1836 conform to the preceding estimate, the expenditures of the year will have amounted to $20,322,083 19; and the unexpended balance which will remain in the Treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, applicable to the service of 1837, will be $8,595,994 21; but under the standing appropriations for pensions, &c. and for arming the militia, above mentioned, there will also be under the control of the Department for the year 1837, so much as may be required for those objects.

The aggregate of the estimates made by this Department for the service of the year 1837, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be included in his general estimate to be laid before Congress, is $10,758,431 33; which, if con firmed by the requisite appropriations, will make, when added to the balance of $8,595,994 21, estimated to remain in the Treasury on the 31st day of December, 1836, an aggregate of $19,354 425 54 cts. applicable to the service of 1837; besides the amount which may be required from the standing appropriations above mentioned.

The various bureaus and offices of the Department to which the sums making the above mentioned aggregates are respectively referrible, will appear by the table annexed, marked A; and the details of each aggregate, except those of the estimates, will appear in the documents from those bureaus, and from the accounting offices, accompanying this report. The details of the estimates for 1837 are included in the statement transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, as above mentioned.

The estimates for the year 1837 include only those objects which are authorized by existing laws. The estimates for the Engineer Office, the Topographical Bureau, and the Ordnance Department, embrace, in accordance with the usual course of legislation, various amounts which, when added to the present unexpended balances, will constitute, in the case of each of those bureaus, an aggregate amount much larger, in all probability, than can be actually expended in the year 1837.

On the other hand, the estimates above mentioned include nothing for the suppression of Indian hostilities, nor for new works or any other objects not already authorized by law. A farther appropriation is immediately needed for the suppression and prevention of Indian hostilities, including the maintenance of the volunteers on the southwestern frontier. The subject does not admit of specific estimates; but there is danger that at least one million of dollars will be required for this purpose.

In concluding, I desire to express my obligations to the experienced and able heads of the several branches of the department, for the aid they have given me in the preparation of this report. Having very recently undertaken the temporary care of the department, and many of its affairs being very foreign to my ordinary studies and pursuits, I have had, in this matter, as well as in others, constant occasion for their assistance. They cannot be held responsible for all the suggestions contained in this paper; but from me, at least, are justly entitled to this tribute.

I have the honor to be, sir,

With high respect,

Your obedient servant,

B. F. BUTLER,

Secretary of War ad interim.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, }
December 3d, 1836. }

To the President of the United States:

SIR: In presenting for your consideration at this time the condition of our Navy for the passed year, I am enabled to assure you that since my report of the 5th of December last, there has been an increased activity in the construction and equipment of vessels at our navy yards, and in the movements of our ships and squadrons at sea and on foreign stations.

The Columbia, a frigate of the first class, has been finished, launched, and nearly completed for sea.

The brigs Dolphin and Porpoise have been built, launched, and fitted for sea.

The frigate Macedonian, of the second class, has been finished, launched, and equipped for sea; and she is now receiving her crew, as the ship of the commanding officer of the South Sea exploring expedition.

The two barks, Pioneer and Consort, and schooner Pilot, have been built, launched, and so far equipped, as to be ready for receiving their crews.

The store-ship Relief, has been finished, launched, and equipped, and is now receiving her stores.

The repairs of the ship of the line North Carolina have been completed, and she is equipped and fitted for sea, and is now under sailing orders for the Pacific station.

The repairs of the razee Independence have been completed, and she is now nearly equipped for sea.

The ship of the line Delaware has been placed in dry dock, and her repairs commenced.

The ship of the line Columbus, has also been put into dry dock, and her repairs commenced.

The repairs of the ship of the line Ohio, have been commenced and considerably advanced.

The repairs of the sloops of war Falmouth and Fairfield, have been completed.

The sloop of war Natchez, and schooner Grampus, have been repaired and equipped for sea.

The labor upon the ship of the line Pennsylvania, has been resumed, with a view to her completion; and she will probably be ready for launching in the early part of next summer.

The steam vessel building at New York, is so far completed as to be ready for the reception of her engines and machinery; in procuring which, there has been some unavoidable delay. It was desirable to secure the services of the most able engineer in the United States, to superintend the construction of the engines and machinery of this, as well as other steam vessels proposed to be built for the service of the United States. Efforts have been made to secure the services of such an engineer, but without success. The first attempt to procure the requisite engines and machinery, by contract, by advertising for proposals, proved abortive; as the lowest offers for the boilers and for the engines, were made by different persons; and the person offering for the engines, declined the contract, because he could not also have the contract for the boilers. Arrangements, however, have been since made for procuring the engines and boilers wanted; and the vessel will probably be ready for service in the course of next summer.

For a detailed statement of the condition of our vessels on the stocks, as well as those afloat at our navy yards, and the means of completion, as well as repair, I beg leave to refer to the reports of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, herewith submitted, marked H and I; and for the amount of timber, iron and other materials, procured for the gradual improvement of the navy, I refer to their report, marked L.

Much has been done in advancing the works and improvements hitherto authorized at the different navy yards, except at that of Pensacola. The works and improvements for which appropriations have been made at that yard, have been delayed until a permanent plan for the same, after a due examination of a board appointed for that purpose, could be adopted.

Since my last annual report, the following vessels have been employed in the Mediterranean: the frigates Constitution, United States and Potomac; the sloop of war John Adams, and the schooner Shark; the ship of the line Delaware having been withdrawn from that squadron, and the frigate United States added to it, within the present year.

The frigate Potomac having been employed on that station for upwards of two years, has been ordered home, with instructions to run down the coast of Africa, and visit the settlements at Cape Mesurado, Cape Palmas, and Bassa Cove; thence, to proceed to Rio de Janeiro, and after communicating with the commander of our squadron there, to return to Norfolk.

In the West Indies, the frigate Constellation, the sloops of war Vandalia, St. Louis, Concord, Warren, Boston, and Natchez, and the schooner Grampus, have been actively employed. The Warren sailed for that station the latter part of December last, and has returned within a few days to Norfolk for repairs; and when these shall be completed, she will rejoin the squadron.

The Concord sailed from Portsmouth, N. H. the 27th of February last. The Boston on the 10th of July last, from Boston. The Natchez from New York on the 4th of August, and the schooner Grampus on the 10th of April last. All these vessels, except the Warren, are now on that station.

The brig Porpoise has been employed in conveying the Commissioners appointed under a resolution of the Senate, directing an examination of the harbors south of the Chesapeake bay, with a view to their fitness for the purposes of a navy yard. She is daily expected at Norfolk, after which it is intended that she shall sail as soon as conveniently may be, to join the West India squadron.

On the coast of Brazil, the sloops of war Erie and Ontario have been employed. The Ontario returned to the United States in June last, has been undergoing repairs at Norfolk, and she is reported to be in readiness for a crew.

The brig Dolphin sailed in September last from New York, with instructions to proceed to the coast of Africa, and visit the settlements at Gambia, Bissau, Nunez, Cape Mesurado, Bassa Cove, and Cape Palmas; thence to proceed to Rio de Janeiro, to form a part of the Brazilian squadron.

In the Pacific, the frigate Brandywine, the sloop Vincennes, and the schooner Boxer, have been employed. The sloop Vincennes, which previously to my last report was ordered to return to the United States, by way of the East Indies, arrived at Norfolk on the 6th of June last. The frigate Brandywine has been ordered home, and she is probably on her way at this time; her place will be supplied by the ship of the line North Carolina, now under sailing orders.

In the East Indies, the sloop Peacock and schooner Enterprise have been engaged in protecting as well as extending our commerce. They are now on their return to the United States, with orders to visit the settlements of the American Colonization Society on the coast of Africa, near Cape Palmas, Bassa Cove, and Monrovia.

Our squadrons at sea and on foreign stations, have afforded to our commerce all the aid and protection that their means would permit.

It was believed that our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the West Indies, would be more exposed than in any other quarter. To meet the apprehended danger, an unusual large force has been placed at the disposal of Commodore Dallas, the commander of the West India station. In addition to the vessels already stated as forming his squadron, three revenue cutters and three steamboats have been placed under his command; and he has been charged with the complicated duties of protecting our commerce, of preventing the importation of slaves into Texas or the United States, and of co-operating with the officers of the Army and militia, in prosecuting the war against the Creek and Seminole Indians; in the performance of all which duties, his squadron has rendered the most essential services to the country.

In maintaining so large a force on the West India station, which ought to be still increased, it has not been in the power of this Department to send to other stations the number of vessels which the safety of our commerce required, and serious apprehensions have been justly entertained, that our merchants might sustain heavy losses from the want of an adequate force on the Pacific and Brazilian station, especially on the latter. Although these apprehensions have not been realized, yet a due regard to the interests of commerce, and the honor of our country, requires that a more respectable force should be sent to those stations, as soon as practicable. There is no serious difficulty in sending out such a force, but that arising from the want of seamen; and this difficulty will be in some degree obviated on the arrival of the vessels now on their return to the United States.

When, at the commencement of the last and preceding sessions of Congress, it was recommended that a considerable addition should be made to the number of our ships in commission, to meet the exigencies of the rapidly increasing commerce of our country, it was perceived that, should the measure be adopted, as it has been, by the liberal appropriations of Congress, it would be necessary to adopt, at the same time, measures for increasing the number of our seamen. The most obvious means of accomplishing this object, was the one recommended, of enlisting into the service of our Navy boys over the age of thirteen, and under the age of eighteen, until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. A bill for this purpose has

In the case, for instance, of a captain dying when in command of a foreign station, a question arises whether his widow shall receive a pension to the amount of six hundred dollars a year, to which she would be entitled if the act increasing the pay had not passed; or whether she shall receive the half of the amount to which her husband was entitled as commander on a foreign station, as a captain on other duty, or as a captain off duty. Like difficulties occur with respect to the widows of other officers.

The necessity of an explanatory act, to obviate these difficulties, was respectfully suggested. The subject received the attention of both Houses of Congress, but no final action was had upon it. The question remaining unsettled, creates much embarrassment in this Department.

That the widow of a captain who for years has commanded on foreign stations, but has returned to his country, and not on duty at the time of his death, shall receive but little more than half the pension she would be entitled to had her husband died a few weeks or days sooner, is evidently unjust. Nor is it just that the widows of captains who died of wounds received in battle or otherwise in the late war, should receive pensions of but a little more than half what might be awarded to the widows of captains dying since the third of March, 1835.

The rank of the officer, it is respectfully suggested, should regulate the amount of pension to the widow, rather than the accidental circumstance of service at the time of his death.

In my last annual report, I stated that previously to the passing of the act of the 30th of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps, doubt rations had been allowed to the commandant of the corps, and to the officers of the same, commanding at the navy yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and Pensacola; and to the senior marine officers in the squadrons in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, the Brazilian coast, and the Pacific ocean, all receiving the sanction of Congress by their appropriations. By this act, the officers of the Marine Corps are to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances as are given to officers of similar grades in the infantry of the Army.

The act of the 16th of March, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States, authorizes allowances to the commanding officers of each separate post of such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall from time to time direct.

These provisions of this last act were continued by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment.

The paymaster of the Marine Corps made payments for double rations to officers heretofore receiving the same, from the first of July, to the 30th of September, 1834; but the accounting officers of the Treasury did not think proper to allow the same, inasmuch as the commands of these officers had never been designated as separate stations, agreeably to the rule prescribed for the army.

This is a case of difficulty, which, it is respectfully suggested, requires legislative interposition. This subject received the favorable consideration, but not final action, of Congress at their last session. It is confidently hoped, that the claims of this corps will receive the early attention which their necessities require, and to which they are entitled by their merits—merits which are much strengthened by their patriotic conduct, in volunteering their services in a campaign against the Creek Indians, in which they have distinguished themselves by the zeal and perseverance in the duties assigned to them. As, however, they have been attached to the Army, while on this campaign, their merits will more appropriately receive the notice of the War, than of the Navy Department.

In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of March last, requiring a course of experiments to be instituted, for the purpose of ascertaining the efficiency, and testing the safety, of the medium or light guns of the Navy, and of comparing their effects with the guns for which they were proposed to be substituted, a Board of Commissioners has been appointed, consisting of Commodore Charles Morris, Commodore Daniel T. Patterson, Commodore Thomas ap Catesby Jones, Captain William B. Shubrick, and Captain Lawrence Kearney, to make the course of experiments required. Several officers have been detailed to cooperate with them, and very extensive preparations have been made near Old Point Comfort, to have the experiments made in the most complete and satisfactory manner. As soon as the proper experiments can be made, the results will be reported to the House of Representatives.

By your directions, given under a resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 24th of May last, that the Executive be requested to cause to be made the necessary examinations and surveys of the several harbors south of the mouth of the Chesapeake bay, and a report of the comparative facilities and advantages of the same, for the establishment of a navy yard, a board has been constituted, consisting of Commodore M. T. Woolsey, Captain Alex. Claxton, and Master Commandant E. R. Shubrick, who were sent out in the brig Porpoise, under the command of Lieut. William Ramsay, to make the required examinations and surveys. After having made those examinations and surveys, the commissioners have returned to New York. Their report will, as soon as received, be communicated, as required by the resolution.

By your directions, also, a board has been constituted, consisting of Commodore Charles Stewart, Commodore Alex. J. Dallas, and Captain W. C. Bolton, aided by a competent engineer, to examine the navy yard at Pensacola, and to prepare plans for the improvement of the same. These commissioners have completed their examinations and plans, the result of which will be submitted to you in a separate report for your consideration and approval.

Under the act of the 30th of June, 1834, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make experiments for the safety of the steam-engine, and appropriating five thousand dollars for that purpose, the memorial of John C. F. Salomon, presenting a plan of a steam-boiler, composed of inverted arches, which he has invented, and which he considers as superior to the common cylindrical boiler, was referred to me by the House of Representatives.

On the assurance of Mr. Salomon, that the sum of four hundred dollars would be amply sufficient for making all the experiments necessary for testing the value of his alleged improvement, I directed that sum to be expended in making and preparing two boilers, under his immediate superintendence. One a common cylindrical boiler, the other upon his plan of inverted arches. Experiments were made upon these boilers in February last, near the eastern front of the Capitol, in the presence of a large number of the members of Congress and others, but without any satisfactory result.

Mr. Salomon requested me to make further experiments upon these boilers, which I declined, but permitted him to have the use of the boilers for making such experiments as he might think proper; so that, if there is any value in his alleged improvement, he has the means of showing it at the public expense.

The sum of $519 75 was heretofore expended under this act in testing Mr. Phillips's supposed improvement in steam-boilers, as stated in my last report; which, added to the sum expended on Mr. Salomon's supposed improvement, amounts to $919 75, leaving an unexpended balance of the appropriation of $4,080 25.

By the statement marked W, hereto annexed, it will appear that of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade, there remains in the Treasury a balance of $11,413 58.

The necessary references to papers and documents connected with this report, will be found in a schedule hereto annexed.

All which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
December 5, 1836.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: In his report of last year, the undersigned stated the post roads of the United States to be about 113,774 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails upon them equal to about 25,869,486 miles.

On the first July last, the post roads were about 118,264 miles in extent, and the annual transportation of the mails was at the rate of 27,578,620 miles, viz:

On horse s and in sulkies,	8,291,504
In stages,	17,408,820

Within the quarter ending 30th September last, improvements were ordered, on old mail routes, increasing the rate of annual transportation 375,824 miles, 306,592 miles of which was in stages. Of the routes established at the last session of Congress, 912 miles have been put under contract, adding 140,000 miles of annual transportation.

An express mail has been started within the last month, from Philadelphia to Mobile, a distance of 1,230 miles, adding to the rate of annual transportation 893,440 miles. The rate of annual transportation at this time is little short of 29,000,000 miles.

Of the new routes, 30,537 miles remain to be put in operation, which will add to the annual service 3,487,788 miles.

The accompanying report of the First Assistant Postmaster General, marked 1, will give this information more in detail.

The number of post offices in the United States on the 1st July, 1835, was 10,770; on the 1st July, 1836, it was 11,091; and on the 1st instant, 11,120.

During the year ending the 30th June last, 666 post offices were established; 345 discontinued; and there were 1844 changes of postmasters.

The number of post offices will be greatly increased in the coming year, in consequence of the great extension of mail routes.

The accruing revenue of the department for the year ending the 30th of June last, according to statements from the Auditor's office, was as follows, viz:

From letter postages	$3,010,249 43
newspapers and pamphlets	376,217 13
finer	3,034 63
Estimated for deficient returns	8,934 00

Total - $3,398,455 19

The engagements and liabilities of the department for the same year, were as follows, viz:

For transportation of the mails	$1,633,051 76
compensation of postmasters	812,802 67
ship, steamboat, and way letters	26,470 76
wrapping paper	15,013 82
office furniture	3,508 35
advertising	22,596 43
mail bags	24,837 44
blanks	27,029 06
mail locks and keys, and stamps	5,877 07
mail depredations, and special agents	5,113 12 clerks for offices	122,933 35
miscellaneous	31,589 93
Estimated for claims not presented	20,000 00

Total - $2,755,623 76

Excess of revenue over engagements and liabilities - $642,831 43

In the report of last year the excess was estimated at $476,227 00; but the revenue was $105,763 19 more than the estimate, and the expenditure $60,841 24 less, which accounts for the difference.

The revenue of the last exceeds that of the preceding year $404,878 53, equal to thirteen and a half per cent. increase.

The general condition of the department on the 1st of July last, is shown by statements from the Auditor's office to have been as follows, viz:

Due to the Department prior 1st July, 1835,	$602,482 40
Deduct for bad and doubtful debts	131,327 36
	$471,155 04

	$642,783 81

The suspended claims, a part of which has been paid, are not included in these statements.

Of the old debts, there was paid out of the revenue of the year ending 30th June last, the sum of $466,376.

As anticipated in the last report, the bank debt was paid off in April last. The cash in bank has since rapidly accumulated, and on the 1st November last was $550,000. Deducting all outstanding warrants, it was $503,721 11. The sum of $83,278 has been paid to Messrs. Stockton and Stokes on the award of the Solicitor of the Treasury, but notwithstanding this payment, and a great extension of mail service, it is estimated that the cash in bank will exceed $600,000 before the first day of May next.

The accounts of postmasters are rendered, and the quarterly balances paid by them, with admirable promptitude. There are 1,010 post offices, yielding about $382,000, after deducting the compensation of postmasters and other charges paid by them, which deposite their net income in bank weekly or monthly during each quarter, or within fifteen days after its close. There are 9,388 offices, yielding a net revenue of about $222,000 quarterly, which are directed to pay their proceeds to contractors immediately after the close of each quarter. The number of offices directed to retain their funds until drawn upon, is 141, yielding about $8,600 quarterly. The balance of the offices are special, and pay directly to those who carry the mails to them for the proceeds, except a few new offices, and others, which are not yet arranged under either denomination. From an examination of actual results, the undersigned is warranted in saying that more than ninety-five per cent. of the revenue of this department is collected within thirty days after the close of the quarters in which it accrues, without any expense therefor whatsoever.

By an examination of a portion of the quarterly accounts, it appears that the increase of revenue for the quarter ending 30th September last, over the corresponding quarter of last year, was about sixteen per cent. The ratio will probably be as large during the whole year, especially as the improvements, the express mail, and the new routes, will produce a considerable augmentation. For safety, however, it may be estimated at fifteen per cent, yielding a revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1837, amounting to $3,908,222.

During the year ending the 30th June, 1838, the new routes and other improvements in the mail service will doubtless produce a decided effect on the income of the department; and it may be reasonably anticipated that there will be an advance of at least fifteen per cent. over that of the current year. If this anticipation be realized, the revenue of that year, at the present rates of postage, will be about $4,494,000, exceeding the estimated current rate of expenditure at its commencement about $688,000. And it is expected that the department will have a surplus of cash in bank before the 1st of August next, exceeding $700,000.

In view of these facts and estimates, the undersigned does not hesitate to recommend a revision of the present rates of postage, to take effect on the 1st July next, with a view to a reduction of about twenty per cent. To this end, he suggests the following scale of letter postages in lieu of the present, viz:

75 miles and under	5 cents.
150 miles and over 75	10
300 miles and over 150	15
600 miles and over 300	20
Over 600 miles	25

No better plan than the present suggests itself in relation to charges of double, triple, and quadruple postage, and postage by weight.

From its simplicity, this scale will be easily remembered. It proposes to introduce the federal currency, renders copper coins unnecessary in making change, and saves the loss to the people arising from fractions. It will reduce the labor now required in making up and examining postmasters' accounts, about one fourth.

If the proposed scale of letter postages shall be adopted, it will be necessary to raise the lowest rate of commissions to enable the postmasters at the large offices to carry on their business. The propriety of placing gold coins sent by mail on the same footing as bank notes, is suggested.

Great changes have taken place in the newspaper business of the country since the present rates of postage were established. Newspapers have not only increased in number, but many of them have grown to an inordinate size. Postage, however, is the same, whether the newspaper be great or small. If not carried over 100 miles and out of the State where printed, it is 1 cent; if out of the State and over 100 miles, 1½ cents. The policy of reducing the rates of postage on newspapers generally, is doubted. They constitute, in weight, probably two-thirds of the mails, are in many parts of the country difficult of transportation, and produce numberless failures. These considerations would be of no moment if it were really necessary that large quantities of newspapers should be transported from one end of the Union to the other, as means of instructing and enlightening the public mind; but that office can be as well performed by the local presses as by newspapers from a distance. To reduce the postage on newspapers below the actual cost of carrying them, would be to tax the correspondence of the country generally for the benefit of the large newspaper establishments in the principal cities, to the injury of all the distant and country presses. Such a measure is not believed to be consistent with sound principle or good policy. It is not sound principle to tax the business of one portion of the people for the benefit of another portion; it is not good policy to aid the large city establishments in monopolizing the newspaper circulation, to the exclusion of the local and country presses. But there is justice and good policy in graduating the postage on newspapers according to the size and weight of the matter to be conveyed. The following scale of newspaper postages is therefore suggested in lieu of the present, viz:

SIZE OF NEWSPAPERS.	RATES OF POSTAGE.
	Carried not over 200 miles, nor out of the State.	Carried over 200 miles, and out of the State.
Containing 550 square inches, or under	½ cent.	1 cent.
920 square inches, and over 550,	1	1½
over 920 square inches,	1½	2

If these rates were reduced one half, it would not materially diminish the means of the Department, provided the entire newspaper postage were paid in advance. So great an innovation would probably be inexpedient; but where editors will pay in advance the postage of their whole impression sent by mail, the Postmaster General might be safely authorized to accept one-half of the foregoing rates.

Single newspapers are now extensively used, through various devices and conventional signs, to answer the purpose of letters, and evade the payment of postage. It would check this abuse if they were in all cases subjected to double postage, to be paid in advance.

The rates of postage on periodical pamphlets may be advantageously regulated upon the same principles as those suggested for newspapers, and reduced to the lowest rate which will pay for their transportation. If a preference be given to any thing, it should be to works on agriculture, science, and the mechanic arts; but the principle is believed to be a good one in relation to the mails, that every thing shall pay its own way.

Fugitive pamphlets may with propriety be subjected to double postage, always paid in advance.

The proposed revision of postages, if taken as a whole, would reduce the income of the Department from two to three hundred thousand dollars below its estimated expenditures; but the surplus on hand will sustain it until the regular increase of revenue will cover the difference.

The franking privilege has been so far extended, and is by many so unscrupulously used, as to constitute an abuse which requires correction. Some who possess it do not hesitate to cover the correspondence of their friends and neighbors with their franks, in direct contravention of the law. A wilful violation by postmasters, when made known to the department, is punished by instant removal from office; but public officers of higher dignity, though more criminal, cannot be reached by the same authority. Violations of law in this respect, by those who are under pre-eminent obligations to set examples of obedience to its precepts, are believed to be diminishing, and there is ground to hope that they will soon measurably cease.

An amendment of the law is necessary in reference to the mode of making contracts with railroad companies. The law prescribing the manner of making mail contracts generally, presupposes the existence of competition in bidding, and is adapted to the existing state of things on all routes where the mails are carried on horseback or in stages. But the reason of the law is not applicable to most cases where railroad service is required, because there is no competition. To advertise for service on such lines is a mockery. Either the department must give what the companies choose to demand, or the compensation must be adjusted by negotiation before advertisement or afterwards. Practically, the power of the Postmaster General as to the amount to be paid is unlimited, because he is authorized to accept the lowest offer, however enormous. It is desirable that this power shall be limited by a law, prescribing some fixed basis upon which all such contracts shall be made. None presents itself so equitable as the weight of the mails to be conveyed. An act fixing a reasonable rate per pound for carrying the mails a given distance, would operate as a restriction upon the power of the Postmaster General; whilst it would undoubtedly facilitate the making of arrangements with the railroad companies. At present, the views of the department and those of most of the companies differ so widely as to the amount which ought to be paid, as to render hopeless any present prospect of an adjustment. If the price were limited by law, the companies would expect no more, and the department would not refuse to pay it. To secure the advantages of competition where it exists, the practice of advertising might be continued, and the contracts assigned, as in other cases, to the lowest bidder. A few of the railroad companies have exhibited a disposition to carry the mails at prices deemed reasonable. The most important of these is the Camden and Amboy company. The managers of that road, justly considering their interests as best secured by accommodating the public and the Government on liberal terms, have undertaken to convey the mails in a manner, and at a price, which are highly satisfactory. The Petersburg and Roanoke company have evinced a like disposition, as have some others.

To render the department measurably independent of the railroads, and accomplish other important results, an express mail has been started on the great mail line between New York and New Orleans. From New York to Philadelphia, and from Mobile to New Orleans, it is merged in the great mail carried in railroad cars and steamboats. The great mail is twelve days and seventeen hours, according to contract, in going from New York to Mobile, and twelve days twelve hours returning. The express mail is five days seventeen hours going from New York to Mobile, and five days twenty-three hours returning. One day is occupied in transporting the mails between Mobile and New Orleans.

The success of this experiment is not doubted; and the size of the mail already affords an assurance that it will produce an income more than sufficient to support it.

This mail leaves far behind all news conveyed upon railroads, or by any other means.

It will give unprecedented activity to commercial transactions between the north and the south. New York communicates with New Orleans in half the usual time; all enterprises are expedited; the whole intervening country and the Valley of the Mississippi will feel the impulse.

The editors and people of New Orleans will receive the news from New York in less than half the time it has heretofore occupied in the transit. The editors will have the advantage of being the original dispensers of the news to their subscribers; and the people will obtain it through their own papers, without postage, five or six days sooner than it can reach them in the New York papers, with postage. The editors and the people along the whole route, and to the right and left, will participate in the same advantages in a greater or less degree. On the other hand, the circulation in the south of newspapers from the principal cities of the north will undoubtedly be diminished. This injury is more than counterbalanced by the benefits secured to the local establishments; and if were not, it is not to be brought into competition with the advantages of an earlier transmission and dissemination of commercial and other intelligence. No measure should be taken with a view to injure the great city establishments; but it would be unreasonable and unjust in the Department to withhold information from the people of the south, because it cannot carry, with equal expedition, the cumbersome sheets from the northern newspaper presses. It is, and doubtless will continue to be, the policy of the Department not to send the news with less expedition; but to bring the whole mail to the speed of the express as fast as it can secure continuous railroad or steamboat transportation.

The undersigned confidently believes it will be found expedient, within the coming year, to start express mails from Washington city along the route of the national road to St. Louis, from New Orleans, through Nashville, Louisville, and Cincinnati, to connect above with the great eastern and western route; and from Boston, through Albany, to Buffalo, New York. Such mails on these routes, he believes, would immediately support themselves, and give an activity to business and correspondence in every direction, which would much enhance the general revenues of the department, and promote public intelligence, and prosperity. But should experience or reflection lead to the conviction that these enterprises will not produce an increase of revenue sufficient to support them, they will not be undertaken.

The attention of the undersigned has been urgently called by the deputy postmaster general of the British North American provinces to the insecurity of correspondence carried on through the packet ships between Canada and the United States on the one side, and the British isles on the other. Valuable letters and packets sent from Canada through the port of New York, and from various parts of the United States, never reach their destination. The only effectual remedy which suggests itself is a regular mail across the ocean, and a direct connection between the post offices of the two countries. By a reciprocal arrangement, mails might be interchanged between the post offices in New York and Liverpool, or any other foreign port, to be conveyed by the packets, or other vessels, under contract. The number of letters now crossing the ocean is so great, that a moderate postage on them would pay the cost of their transportation. There is scarcely a doubt that such an arrangement may be effected, if Congress shall think it expedient to grant the necessary power.

The object of authorizing printers' exchange papers to pass in the mails free of postage, would be further promoted by extending the privilege to exchanges with printers in foreign countries; an extension which is desired by the printers in the foreign provinces bordering on the United States, and will be the more useful if the proposed interchange of mails with post offices in Europe shall be authorized.

The building in which the General Post Office is kept is not fire-proof, and its valuable books and papers are daily exposed to destruction. With such ample means as the Government now has at command, the undersigned perceives no good reason why the greatest possible security should not be given to its archives. The other Executive departments suffer inconvenience from the distance of the General and City Post Office; and since the passage of the late law which connects the Post Office with the Treasury, and makes frequent references to the President necessary, that inconvenience is seriously felt by the department itself.

Annexed will be found an outline of the organization of the department under the late act of Congress, marked 12.

The Contract Office is overwhelmed with the increased business brought upon it by extensions of mail service and the new routes. Its force is found to be inadequate to the performance of its duties; and it requires two additional clerks, one of the first, and the other of the second grade.

The Appointment Office has a sufficient force for the performance of its duties with accuracy and promptitude.

The duties of the Inspection Office are rapidly extending, and its present force will not long be equal to their performance. Its chief object is a rigid supervision over the rendition of postmasters' accounts, and the performance of contractors. Conducted with system and energy, it will soon be felt on our thousands of mail routes, whenever a delinquency occurs. Most of the contractors perform their service with great fidelity and precision; but there are a few, some of them on important routes, who evade their contract obligations whenever they have a temptation to do so, relying for impunity on their adroitness in making excuses, and the indulgence of the department. They will find it their interest to fulfil their engagements, or quit the service. In some parts of the country where complaints of irregular mails are loudest, the fault is not in the department, nor the contractors, but in the roads. The department is obliged to use such roads as it finds, and it is unreasonable in the people to expect regular mails unless they will make good roads.

My three assistants are assiduous in their duties, often by night as well as by day; and in relation to their compensation, deserve the favorable consideration of Congress.

The Auditor's Office is proceeding with vigor to accomplish the objects of its creation. The disbursement of the Post Office funds through the Treasury, formerly deemed impracticable, is effected with the utmost facility. Post Office warrants are reduced to the size of ordinary bank checks, and, with the check of the Treasurer endorsed, are remitted with the same ease, and answer the same purpose. Without the inconvenience of specific appropriations, the accounts of the department are more specific, more easily understood, and more readily examined, than those of any other department of the Government. It is the desire of the undersigned, which the Auditor has shown every disposition to promote, to render them intelligible to any one who may examine the books.

Difficulty has in some cases been experienced in renewing, for six months, the mail contracts which will expire on the 31st instant, under the authority vested in the Postmaster General, by resolution, at the last session of Congress. The object of the resolution was to facilitate a change in the commencement of the contract year. To promote the same object and avoid a like difficulty in relation to the remaining contracts, power is asked to let them in the usual mode for four years and a half, which will lead to the same result.

I have the honor to be,

Your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

SPEECH OF MR. EWING, OF OHIO,

In Senate, Monday, December 14, 1836—on the Rescission of the Treasury Order.

Mr. EWING'S resolutions having been read, he spoke as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: When I presented these resolutions a few days since, it was suggested by the Senator from Missouri, over the way, (Mr. Benton,) that he would oppose them at their second reading, for the purpose of being early heard in support of the order which it is their principal office to rescind. With this I am entirely satisfied. I also wish to be heard on a subject which is of vital interest to the State which I represent, and to the whole west; and I concur with him most heartily in this expedient to avoid delay in bringing before the Senate, and sending abroad to the nation, the opinions of members of this body on this important subject. I therefore, in accordance with that suggestion, which seemed to meet the sanction of the Senate, will now proceed to give my views upon the order which these resolutions propose to rescind.

This extraordinary paper was issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 11th of July last, in the form of a circular to the Receivers of Public Money in the several land offices in the United States, directing them, after the 15th of August then next, to receive in payment for public lands nothing but gold and silver, and certificates of deposits, signed by the Treasurer of the United States, with a saving in favor of actual settlers, and bona fide residents in the State in which the land happened to lie. This saving was for a limited time, and expires, I think, to-morrow. The professed object of this order was to check the speculations in public lands; to check excessive issues of bank paper in the west, and to increase the specie currency of the country; and the necessity of the measure was supported, or pretended to be supported, by the opinions of members of this body, and the other branch of Congress. But before I proceed to examine in detail this paper, its character and its consequences, I will briefly advert to the state of things out of which it grew.

I am confident, and I believe I can make the thing manifest, that the avowed objects were not the only, nor even the leading objects for which this order was framed. They may have influenced the minds of some who advised it, but those who planned, and those who at last virtually executed it, were governed by other and different motives, which I shall proceed to explain.

It was foreseen, prior to the commencement of the last session of Congress, that there would be a very large surplus of money in the public Treasury beyond the wants of the country for all reasonable expenditures. It was also well understood that the land bill, or some other measure for the distribution of this fund, would be again presented to Congress; and, if the true condition of the public Treasury were known and understood, that its distribution, in some form or other, would be demanded by the country. On the other hand, it seems to have been determined by the party, and some of those who act with it thoroughly, that the money should remain where it was, in the deposit banks, so that it could be wielded at pleasure by the Executive. Hence the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the two Houses of Congress on the 8th day of December, 1835, (Doc. 2, page 2,) makes the aggregate balance in the Treasury, on the 1st day of January, 1836, no more than $19,147,000; but now the controversy is ended, he shows, in his report of the 6th of December, 1836, that the true amount of that balance was $26,749,803, making an error of $7,602,803. There enters into this, and thence arises the egregious error, an estimate of the receipts for the last quarter of the then current year. After three quarters of that quarter had elapsed; after this was in the hands of inferior officers, and, in the ordinary course of business, without the knowledge of his several bureaus at Washington, receipts within that quarter of about seven millions, he estimates the aggregate receipts for the whole quarter at $4,950,000, whereas the true amount, as now reported, was $11,950,000, making a difference in the receipts of that single quarter of seven millions. I think I am very safe in saying that this most extraordinary error never would have occurred in this report, if it had been the wish of the Executive to parade before the nation a very prosperous state of the public Treasury, and a large receipt for the year 1835. If nothing had been feared about the land bill or distribution project, the estimate for that quarter would probably have equalled the actual receipts.

The statement of the Secretary, however, showed a surplus, but he proceeds to calculate it away in the year 1836. He conjectures that the receipts of that year will amount to $19,750,000, and of this he allows the public lands to produce $4,000,000. The whole receipt being less, by about $4,000,000, than sufficient to sustain the estimated expenses of the year. But in his report of December 6, 1836, he gives the receipts of the same year at $47,691,898, more, by about $28,000,000, than his estimate, and of this the public lands yield $24,000,000, six times the amount of that estimate.

These facts are striking; and if the errors originate in mere mistake, which I am willing to believe, they indicate a most extraordinary degree of ignorance as to the business of the country, and the direction of its capital, or a mind easily biased and led into error by preconceived opinions.

But Senators, in the course of the debate which afterwards sprung up on the land bill, went much farther than the Secretary of the Treasury. They denied, and most unequivocally, that there was any surplus, or that there would be any; and, when some of us offered an estimate of what would be the receipts into the Treasury in the current year, we were told that it would be very difficult to fasten that estimate upon us at this session of Congress. I, however, for one, determined to relieve gentlemen from all trouble on that score, as far as regarded myself. On the 15th of March, 1836, I submitted my estimate of the revenues and expenditure of the current year, in a speech which I caused to be printed in a pamphlet form. In this I estimated the receipts from customs for the year at

$19,000,000

The public lands at more than 20,000,000

And I make the whole amount on hand, and received and receivable, in that year, in round numbers, without deducting expenditures, 77,000,000

The customs, it seems, have produced $23,000,- 000, which is $4,000,000 more than my estimate.

The public lands $24,000,000—about the sum which I had supposed. And the footing of the column in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which answers to my estimate of $77,-

000,000, is $74,441,702, being two and a half millions less than I conjectured. More than this deficit, however, is accounted for by the fact that the bank stock which I had supposed will fall in, within the current year, has not yet been sold, or the avails of it received into the Treasury.

When the true state of things became too obvious to be any longer successfully contested;

when it became apparent to every one here and to the public that there was a large amount of public money lying in the deposit banks, and likely to remain there for years, an injury to the public, and beneficial to nobody, except bankers and brokers; and when no other means seemed to offer of resisting a distribution of this fund, the country became suddenly threatened with a foreign war—and, at one time, the walls of our capitol were actually threatened with demolition by the great guns of the French navy, we were in imminent danger of invasion, and appropriations to the amount of more than $80,000,000 were called for by gentlemen who are in favor of economy and reform, to enable the Executive to prepare for defence. But this spectre vanished.

Then we were threatened with Indian invasion and Indian massacre on our whole northwestern frontier. The squabble with a miserable horde of naked savages in the swamps of Florida, which has engaged the attention of this wretched administration for the last year, was magnified into a general and formidable rising of all the tribes east of the Rocky mountains, and military preparations were called for that we might be in armor to do battle with them. At last a report of the Secretary of War, sanctioned by the President, put an end to all this absurdity; the deposit bill passed after a desperate struggle, and then came this measure—the TREASURY ORDER, intended to destroy its effect.

This order grew out of the contest to which I have referred. It was issued, not by the advice of Congress or under the sanction of any law. It was delayed until Congress was fairly out of the city, and all possibility of interference by legislation was removed, and then came forth this new and last expedient. It was known that these funds, received for public lands, had become a chief source of revenue, and it may have occurred to some, that the passage of a Treasury order of this kind would have a tendency to embarrass the country; and as the bill for the regulation of the deposits had just passed, the public might be brought to believe that all the mischief occasioned by the order was the effect of the distribution bill. It has, indeed, happened that this scheme has failed; the public understand it rightly, but that was not by any means certain at the time the measure was devised. It was not then foreseen that the people would as generally see through the contrivance as it has since been found that they do.

There may have been various other motives which led to the measure. Many minds were probably to be consulted; for it is not to be presumed that a step like this was taken without consultation, and guided by the will of a single individual alone. That is not the way in which these things are done. No doubt one effect hoped for by some was, that a check would be given to the sales of the public lands. The operation of the order would naturally be, to raise the price of land by raising the price of the currency in which it was to be paid for. But, while this would be the effect on small buyers, those who purchased on a large scale would be enabled to sell at an advance of ten or fifteen per cent. over what would have been given if the United States lands had been open to purchasers in the ordinary way. Those who had borrowed money of the deposit banks and paid it out for lands, would thus be enabled to make sales to advantage, and by means of such sales make payment to the banks who found it necessary to call in their large loans, in order to meet the provisions of the deposit bill. The order, therefore, was likely to operate to the common benefit of the deposit banks and the great land dealers, while it counteracted the efforts of the obnoxious deposit bill.

There may have been yet another motive actuating some of those who devised this order. There was danger that the deposit banks, when called upon to refund the public treasure, would be unable to do it; indeed, it was said on this floor that the immediate effect of the distribution bill would be to break those banks. Now this Treasury order would operate to collect the specie of the country into the land offices, whence it would immediately go into the deposit banks, and would prove an acceptable aid to them while making the transfers required by law. These seem to me to have been among the real motives which led to the adoption of that order.

But one of the good effects which it was said this order would produce was, that it would prevent over-issues of the banks, especially in the West. Such an opinion, however, if sincerely held, must have grown out of a very narrow view of our commerce and currency. There were no over-issues, save by the deposit banks only, and with respect to them the order would have no such effect. They had made very great loans to land speculators; but that business was all cut off by the distribution bill. That bill straitened those banks, and forced them to draw in their loans; and it was strongly resisted on that very ground; so strongly, indeed, that it was not until within two days before the passage of the bill that the opposition could be brought to believe that they could succeed in passing it. Some of the deposit banks had in their vaults public money to the amount of three times their nominal capital. The regular commerce and business of the country did not employ much beyond that capital; the residue could only be applied to extraordinary purposes. The progress of trade is steady. The commerce of the country advances in a regular manner. It would not absorb the sudden increase of banking resources, but the extra capital found an outlet in loans for the purpose of purchasing public lands. Large amounts of specie were borrowed from the deposit banks and paid into the land offices, whence it was soon after returned to the banks, and loaned again for the same purpose. The distribution bill put an end to this; it went at once to cut up this business by the roots. The banks were required to pay back all the money deposited with them over and above three fourths of the amount of their capital actually paid in; of course, their loans were at once cut short. The Treasury order, therefore, could not be required to do what was already done by an act of Congress. The patient had already been depleted; no sooner was the regular physician gone, but then in comes the quack doctor, and at once cuts an artery, to make the remedy perfect.

It has been said in the President's message, and in the report of his Secretary, that all the banks of the country were in the habit of making over-issues of paper, and that this Treasury order was needed as a check upon such issues. It is a mere assumption; an entire mistake. Where is the evidence to prove it? I speak now, of course, of that part of the Union where I reside; and with which I am best acquainted, and where this order has had its chief effect, and I say that the assertion is wholly unfounded. I know, indeed, that the amount of banking capital has been increased of late years; it may, sometimes, and in some places, have been too extensive, but it never was so there. There never has been in that part of the Union too much banking capital. The banks have increased their issues, but they have not made excessive issues. The course of business with us has changed of late. Four or five years ago we sent our stock alive on foot to market; our flour went to New Orleans—little or none of it went to the North. It then took us from 60 to 90 days to get our returns. But now, since the opening of our canal, we have a Northern as well as a Southern market; and according to the present course of trade, it takes the merchant from six to ten months to make his returns. He must purchase his produce, let it lie by him till the canals open, then ship to New York, and thus in about ten months realize the proceeds. One thousand dollars turned three times is the same in the business of the country as three thousand turned but once. Of course, as the time is three times longer, we want three times the amount of money to do the same business. This has rightly increased three-fold the amount of bank issues. Besides, banks do not issue their notes upon the specie in their vaults—the notion is utterly fallacious: it is the staple produce of the country, which those bank notes purchase; it is the pork and flour of the West, and the cotton and sugar of the South; that is the true capital on which the banks make these issues. The business of the country could not be transacted if the issues of bank paper were based on the amount of gold and silver alone. Our banks at the west are solely commercial. They make loans for no other purpose than purposes of trade; at least if they knew the purpose to which it is to be applied. They do not knowingly loan their money for the purpose of purchasing public land, nor even for the purpose of building or other improvements. A man, to be sure, may obtain a loan, and go and buy land with the money, but that is not the course of our bank business. A merchant buys $100,000 worth of pork or flour on acceptances in New York; he borrows the money to buy it; but it is the produce which is the capital that the bank paper represents; it is that which pays the debt. None of our banks except that gold and silver are to be demanded for their notes. Drafts are demanded; these drafts meet the bills of exchange; and thus the whole transaction is settled. And who calls this overtrading? It is not overtrading. It is apportioning bank issues to the demands of commerce, and nothing more. This currency answers all the purposes of gold and silver. Gold and silver are useless save so far as they represent exchanges. It was such overtrading, however, which the Treasury order put a stop to. It did stop it most effectually. No bank in the west dare now, or has dared, since the emanation of this order, to make any loans or any issues. On the contrary, the banks, as soon as it appeared, all fortified themselves against apprehended danger, and with one accord shut their doors against all loans whatever. Nor dare they open them again until that order shall be taken out of the way, unless, indeed, the course of business should unexpectedly change. Commerce, as we all know, is one of the most ductile things in the world, and it may be circumstances be forced into a new channel; and when it has just scooped out for itself a new course, then, I suppose, some other Executive order will be thrown in to check or obstruct the smooth onward flow of the current.

In my speech of the 15th of March last, *to which I have adverted, I explained the manner in which the public funds were made to pay for the public lands—performing a circuit from the deposite banks to the speculator; from him to the Land Office, and from the Land Office to the deposite banks again—thus operating the exchange of the public lands by millions of acres to large purchasers for mere credit. I was denounced for this at the time; but the President has adopted (an honor which I duly appreciate) the very sentiment, and almost the language which I then used, in his recent message; and he tells us that the Treasury order was intended to remedy this evil—an evil which Congress had, in fact, remedied effectually before the issuing of that order. It would have been a fortunate thing if the mischief had been discovered sooner by the Executive officers, and the abuse corrected before it became a subject of investigation before the Congress.

Another object to be effected by this order is the putting down a paper, and putting up a gold and silver currency. This is its purpose, while its effect has been to banish almost entirely gold and silver from among us. No such thing is now to be heard of. You cannot, in the West, unless it be in towns, get a five dollar bill changed into specie in a ride of thirty miles; not that the banks do not pay specie for their notes, but the effect on the community is the same as if they did not. In consequence of this order, all purchasers of land exchange their notes for gold and silver. In the town in which I reside, there is a bank well provided with resources, and, within a circuit of thirty or forty miles, there are six or seven more equally strong. Before the issuing of this Treasury order, the paper of these banks constituted the currency of that region of country; but, as it touched by the wand of an enchanter, that whole amount of paper has vanished from circulation: not a dollar of it is to be seen. The men who had it carried it to these banks to get gold and silver, and the banks, having redeemed it, shut it up in their vaults, where it remains to guard their gold. There are still some notes in circulation, but they are notes on remote and inconvenient points—on distant banks in Ohio, on Western Pennsylvania, Western New York, Michigan and Virginia. Our local banks used to receive their bills as cash, and, as the course of business permitted, send them home for exchange; but now they husband their own notes, and pay them out, so that paper of this kind constitutes nearly all our circulation, and they are so mixed in small parcels on each bank that it would cost nearly half their value to send them home and cash them. This is our gold and silver currency. The amount of our produce last year was unusually great, and our supply of pork this year, consequent upon it, is very large. There is now a great demand in the Eastern cities for all we have to dispose of; our merchants are well inclined to purchase, but they cannot do it; they deal more or less in borrowed capital, and our banks dare not lend them. They have tried to get money at the East, but the Eastern banks would not loan, because their paper would immediately return upon them. Some of our adventurous men thought of a third expedient; they would go to an intermediate point in Western New York, where no trade centres, and try to get a loan there; because it would be so long before the money would make its way to the Eastern cities, and from thence return to the bank that loaned it. The plan has been tried, and I am told it has to some extent succeeded. I have myself seen bundles of notes issued in Michigan, and payable somewhere in the State of New York, making their way as welcome strangers among us; and such is the sort of currency with which we are obliged to do business; such has been the effect of tampering with the currency by individuals who know nothing of the matter. Currency is a thing which admirably regulates itself, which our merchants admirably regulate; but the hand of ignorance must not touch it. The interference of such regulators is like the effort of some rude giant to move the wheels of a machine which he does not understand; the only effect is to ruin the engine, or give it a motion directly the contrary of that which was intended.

Another alleged object aimed at by the order is to check speculation. And here we find a saving provision in favor of residents within the State, and of actual settlers. Thus a discrimination is made by the Executive between different classes of American citizens, entitled to equal rights under our Constitution and laws. An attempt was made last winter to urge this same measure, or a part of it, upon Congress, but Congress refused its assent, and now it is forced upon the people by Executive authority. No doubt it was supposed that the order would be unpopular without this exception, and would have an especial bad effect just before a Presidential election. The sale was therefore so limited in point of time, as to continue just beyond the time of election, and then to cease. Can any other reason be assigned for the particular date fixed upon? There is a provision in the Constitution directly in the face of this order. Those who drew up the order seemed to have been aware of it, and to have avoided employing the same words as are used in the article of the Constitution. But it is not, therefore, any the less in violation of its provisions. The Constitution declares that the citizens of each of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States; even the States themselves cannot discriminate. But this order gives to the citizens of one State a privilege which the citizens of no other State are allowed to enjoy—that of paying for public land in the ordinary currency of the country. With some, this argument will have but little effect, especially as it is directed against an Executive act; but it is not, therefore, the less sound. But there is another which will find more favor when that will fail. The measure is unpopular; as far it has been felt and understood, it is decidedly unpopular. It is universally condemned throughout the West, at least as far as my acquaintance extends. The very discrimination between citizens of different States is unpopular, as it is unconstitutional and unjust. It is easy, by a familiar example, to show the effect of this branch of the order, how it works in practice, and how it will strike the minds of plain common men. Two neighbors, farmers, whose lands are separated by the boundary line between Ohio and Indiana, each have sons, for whom they wish to purchase land, and they set out together on a journey into the northwest of Indiana to make their purchases. They buy side by side, and enter the land in the same office, they are both citizens of the United States, and it is the United States that sells the land. Yet one of them, he who lives on the Indiana side, is allowed to pay in the ordinary currency of the country, while the other must pay in gold and silver. Yet their fences join; they can see the smoke of each other's chimneys, and nothing separates them but an imaginary line. Our Western people cannot perceive the justice of this. They do not understand it, and they do not like it; the thing is generally unpopular.

But now, sir, there is an expedient for getting rid of the effect of this order, which ordinary plain people do not think of. It is the easiest thing in the world for gentlemen who understand how to manage it. There never was any thing more happily contrived to enable those who are shrewd and experienced in business, to get a selection of the public lands and all for paper. Suppose one of these gentlemen wishes to purchase 10,000 acres of land; he provides himself with no cart to lug about gold and silver to make the purchase, indeed, scores that cumbrous kind of machinery; he takes an easier road. He just goes to three times as many of the neighbors as he wants thousands of acres of land, and he promises to treat them for the mere use of their names. That, you know, costs them nothing, and so A, B, and C, bona fide residents of the State in which the land lies which he wishes to enter, authorize him, under their hand, to enter land in their names. He makes his entry, pays for it in paper, and then gets the whole transferred to himself. This gentleman carried no specie; he did nothing to help the circulation of gold and silver, and yet very snugly gets possession, himself, of all the land he wants. The Treasury order is the very thing for him, while it keeps down the plain dull man that would otherwise be his competitor. Thus genius is patronized, and a gold currency introduced.

But this is not all. There is yet another way of evading the order; and it is provided for in the order itself. Any man may make a deposite of money in the Treasury of the United States, and a certificate of such deposite is receivable at the land office as so much cash. It is said, indeed, that this is according to a law of Congress. But what is the provision of that law? It is, that no man shall obtain a certificate for land till he pays the price of it into the office of a receiver, or into the Treasury of the United States. My construction of this law is, that the individual must have paid for that particular section of land, and not merely have made a general deposite of money. This, however, has been overlooked, and the ordinary course is to deposite a sum of money in one of the deposite banks; the certificate of which is sent to the Treasury, and then a Treasury certificate is issued for the same amount; and I am told that individuals have shaved honest purchasers on these certificates to the amount of fifteen or twenty per cent. It took them about a month to get this thing well into operation. But within the last two months there has been about $200,000 of this kind of specie capital created for the occasion. This is nothing but a fair sample of the practical effect of all attempts to juggle with the public money. The result always is the injury of ordinary industrious citizens, and the enriching and aggrandizing of those who are already rich, and who are keen-sighted and sagacious.

It has been said, and it is a familiar answer to objections such as I have now urged, that, notwithstanding all these difficulties, the price of produce is high, and that, therefore, what has been done to the currency has been for the benefit of the country. It is true produce is high, and that is the reason. We know in this country, from the papers, the wants of all parts of our extended community, and it has happened partly owing to a failure of crops, and partly from other causes, that grain is so scarce and in very great demand east of the mountains. It is nominally high with us in the West, but not as high as it should be in proportion to other things, because our traders cannot get funds to buy with, and competition in the purchase is put down. As the causes of these high prices are not generally understood, I will briefly sketch an outline of my views on that subject. There is an impression gone abroad that the People of the United States ought, of course, to be exporters of grain. But never was there a more incorrect idea. It is against the ordinances of Nature, and the whole course of human things. We never can be exporters of grain unless there be war or famine in Europe. A great part of Europe, the north part of Asia, the north coast of Africa, Egypt, and the islands in the Mediterranean, are all grain growing countries. Grain is their great commodity. England, too, is a rich grain country. All these regions of the earth will supply their own demands for bread, and are destined to do so, while a large part of their clothing will be drawn from our great South.

We have at the North populous cities, extensive manufactoryes; in addition to which there is our immense marine, our navy, our merchantmen, our fishing vessels, all to be supplied from our own grain region. Yet we are seldom in the habit of reflecting that it is but a belt of about four or five degrees of latitude which, in this country, produces wheat advantageously. This comparatively small portion of our country is relied on to supply our whole northern continent, the West India Islands, and South America, all of which are, in this point of view, entirely dependent upon us. Is it then astonishing that the price of wheat should be high? It is no Governmental arrangement. It is not the skill of any administration which has given to our farmers the existing prices. Nor is it owing to any deranged or diseased state of the currency, or of commerce; these prices, in the general, will be maintained; for the price, in this country must at last be regulated by the price at which grain can be imported from the Baltic and the Black Sea. And, indeed, we at the west have reason to complain of the prices we get in comparison with those which our staples command in the eastern cities. I have lately seen it stated that pork is selling at Montreal at $30 per barrel, and at about the same rate in Boston; while in the West we get what is equivalent to about ten or twelve dollars per barrel.

[Mr. KING of Alabama, here stated that the price was $30 in Mobile.]

The price, am sure, is decidedly too low with us.

And now, sir, believing as I do that the Treasury order in question has been productive of all the effects I have stated, I hold that it ought to be rescinded, were it as a mere matter of policy. I am persuaded that its rescission would soon restore the confidence of the people of the West, now so extensively impaired. We ought to prevent the improper discrimination between specie and notes payable in specie. It would enable our banks to make loans to the amount of our produce, and no more. Those institutions with us are skilful and cautious; they make no loans for the purchase of public lands, nor for any object which will prevent its speedy return. In a word, they refuse permanent loans of every kind. Sir, I would prevent the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Executive officer, from making an unwarrantable discrimination between different classes of the citizens of the United States. There should be no such discrimination. We have no right to set up the public property to sale, and then say to A or B this is the price if your business is so and so, or if your politics are of this complexion; but if not, you must pay a higher price. It is against the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution. I would abolish it. It ought to be abolished. It is peculiarly oppressive on the people of the West.

If there is to be a specie currency, why not try the experiment in our Eastern cities? Surely it would be more convenient there. A man in our western region, if he selects a tract of land from the public domain, but is obliged to go away to get the money to pay for his purchase, loses his opportunity. His footsteps are tracked by the speculator or his agent, and the land is gone. If he would secure his section, he must carry his specie in his saddle-bags, and take a pistol in his hand to defend himself from robbers. Is it in this way you would compel your citizens to seek out their home upon the public domain? As soon as he finds a spot to suit him, he must carry away the specie to a land office; and whenever a large quantity accumulates there, an ox-cart, with a guard, must be employed to bring it back to the spot whence he got it. This, sir, has been all the specie currency of which we have heard so much.

This is the active circulation of the precious metals. This is the way in which the Secretary makes up his statements on that subject. The money is carried one way in saddle-bags, and the other way in a cart. I would put an end to this state of things. I would try the hard money experiment, if it must be tried, on the seaboard, where it is easier to try it. As long as your land is offered at sale, it is lawful for all your citizens to buy it. You have no right to disfranchise any of them, under the plea of compelling them to get up a specie circulation.

It is said by the Secretary that he does not possess the same power over the deposit banks since the distributing act which he did before. He succeeded, he tells us, in keeping down the rate of the exchanges until the passage of that law. Now, sir, there is one species of control, which, if the Secretary do not possess, Congress does, and ought to exercise it. It is said that there are several of the deposit banks who have millions of the public treasure in their vaults, and who use it, by their officers or agents, in shoving upon notes or exchanges. They take advantage of the difficulty of the times, and virtually act as brokers, thus keeping up the pressure, and embarrassing the public, while they make enormous profits out of the public money. I would institute an inquiry into this matter, and if banks are guilty of practices of this kind, I would at least leave them to do it with their own money, and not with the money of the people of the United States.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Monday, Dec. 19, 1836—on the Rescission of the Treasury order.

The following resolutions, introduced by Mr. EWING, of Ohio, being at their second reading, viz:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the Treasury order of the eleventh day of July, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

"Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue."

Mr. BENTON said it was unusual to oppose joint resolutions at their second readings; but he had given notice of his intention to oppose this resolution, not for the purpose of attempting to arrest its course, but to excite attention and discussion, and to lay the foundation for a motion which he intended to make, namely: to send the subject to a committee, and to make it the duty of that committee to inquire into the operation and effects of the Treasury order proposed to be rescinded, and into the conduct of the banks which affected to be crippled by it. This motion, and the scope and details of the inquiry, will be brought forward in due time.

The resolution consists of two clauses, the first clear, the second ambiguous. The rescission of the Treasury order, excluding paper money from the land offices, was the object of the first clause; but the second was without specification; and making no allusion to the constitutional currency, and imposing no obligation on the Secretary of the Treasury to use or employ it, it seemed to him that the whole revenues of the Government might be made receivable in paper money. Funds is the word used in the resolution; a word which has no place in our Constitution, nor in our legislation previous to the imposition of the paper system upon us, and which has no definite or legal meaning. It is a paper system phrase; and, in the jargon of that system, is understood to comprehend all sorts of paper credits and securities, and all sorts of currencies, which can be made available in the payment of debts, or in the support of credit. It is a wretched phrase to come into legislation, and ought to be substituted by something of clear and precise import. Gold and silver is the language of our Constitution; and to supersede them by the word "funds," is to banish them from our financial system, and to open the Treasury to the inundation of paper money.

In the observations which he should make upon these resolutions, Mr. B. said, he should not confine himself to a reply merely to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) but looking further back, and all around, and having due regard to what had preceded this motion, and which was indissolubly connected with it, he should treat the whole subject as it appeared before him, and as it had been exhibited to the public. He had especially in his eye a certain speech, delivered in Kentucky, in September last; and a certain letter, written in Philadelphia, in November last. Passages from each of these would be referred to at proper places; and, paying due attention to these givings out, and to all the signs which had been visible for some months past in the political zodiac, he could see distinctly that two great objects were proposed to be accomplished by the instrumentality of this joint resolution: first, the condemnation of President Jackson for a violation of the laws and constitution, and the destruction of the prosperity of the country; and, secondly, the overthrow of the Federal constitutional currency, and the imposition of the paper money system of the States upon the Government and people of the Union. In the first of these objects, the present movement is twin brother to the famous resolution of 1833, but without its boldness; for that resolution declared its object upon its face, while this one eschews specification, and insidiously seeks a judgment of condemnation by inference and argument. In the second of these objects, every body will recognise the great design of the second branch of the same famous resolutions of 1833, which, in the restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States, clearly went to the establishment of the paper system, and its supremacy over the Federal Government. The present movement, therefore, is a second edition of the old one, but a lame and impotent affair compared to that. Then, we had a magnificent panic; now, nothing but a miserable starveling! For though the letter of the President of the Bank of the United States announced, early in November, that the meeting of Congress was the time for the new distress to become intense, yet we are two weeks deep in the session, and no distress memorial—no distress deputation—no distress committees, to this hour! Nothing, in fact, in that line, but the distress speech of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Ewing); so that the new panic of 1836, has all the signs of being a lean and slender affair—a mere church-mouse concern—a sort of dwarfish, impish imitation of the gigantic spectre which stalked through the land in 1833.

That every thing might appear in its proper order, and every actor in this drama have his proper place, Mr. B. would now introduce passages from the speech and letter to which he had referred, reserving other passages for introduction in other stages of the proceedings. And first from the speech:

"Mr. Clay proceeded to speak of the constant TAMPERING WITH THE CURRENCY, which marked the conduct of this administration. One rash, lawless, and crude experiment succeeds another. He considered the late Treasury order, by which all payments for public lands were to be made in specie, with one exception, for a short duration, a most ill advised, illegal, and pernicious measure. In principle it was wrong; in practice it will favor the very speculation which it professes to endeavor to suppress. The officer who issued it, as if conscious of its obnoxious character, shelters himself behind the name of the President.

"But the President and Secretary had no right to promulgate any such order. The law admits of no such discrimination. If the resolution of the 30th April, 1816, continues in operation (and the administration on the occasion of the removal of the deposits, and on the present occasion, relies upon it as in full force,) it gave the Secretary no such discretion as he has exercised. That resolution required and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt such measures as he might deem necessary, 'to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in said legal currency of the United States.' This resolution was restrictive and prohibitory upon the Secretary only as to the notes of banks not redeemable in specie on demand. As to all such notes, he was forbidden to receive them from and after the 20th day of February, 1817. As to the notes of banks which were payable and paid on demand in specie, the resolution was not merely permissive; it was compulsory and mandatory. He was bound, and is yet bound, to receive them, until Congress interferes."

From the letter of Mr. Biddle to Mr. J. Q. Adams, Mr. B. read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 11, 1836.

"MY DEAR SIR: I proceed to the second subject of our conversation—the present state of the currency—which I shall treat dispassionately, as an abstract question of mere finance.

"Our pecuniary condition seems to be a strange anomaly. When Congress adjourned, it left the country with abundant crops, and high prices for them—with every branch of industry flourishing—with more specie than we ever possessed before—with all the elements of universal prosperity. Not one of these has undergone the slightest change; yet, after a few months, Congress will reassemble, and find the whole country suffering intense pecuniary distress. The occasion of this, and the remedy for it, may well occupy our thoughts.

"In my judgment, the main cause of it is the mismanagement of the revenue—mismanagement in two respects: the mode of executing the distribution law, and the order requiring specie for the public lands.

"Such a measure was of itself sufficient to disorganize the currency. But it was accompanied by another, which armed it with a tenfold power of mischief. This was the Treasury order prohibiting the receipt at the land offices of any thing but specie—an act which seems to me a most wanton abuse of power, if not a flagrant usurpation.

"The whole pecuniary system of this country, that to which, next to its freedom, it owes its prosperity, is the system of ex-dit. Our ancestors came here with no money, but with far better things—with courage and industry; and the want of capital was supplied by their mutual confidence. This is the basis of our whole commercial and internal industry. The Government received its duties on credit and sold its lands on credit. When the sales of land on credit became inconvenient, from the complication of accounts, the lands were sold for what is termed cash. But this was only another form of credit; for the banks, by lending to those who purchased lands, took the place of the Government as creditors, and the Government received their notes as equivalent to specie, because always convertible into specie. This was the usage, and may be regarded as the law of the country. By the resolution of Congress passed on the 30th of April, 1816, it was declared that "no duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States."

"This resolution presents various alternatives—the legal currency, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or notes of specie paying banks. A citizen had a right to choose any one of these modes of payment. He had as much right to pay for land with the note of a specie paying bank, as to pay it for duties at the custom-house. If this he denied, certainly any one of them might be accepted by the Treasury; but to prescribe all but one—to refuse every thing but the most difficult thing—to do this without notice of the approaching change in the fundamental system of our dealings—is an act of gratuitous oppression."

"If he prohibits the receipt of any thing but specie to correct land speculations, he may make the same prohibition as to the duties on hardware, or broadcloth, or wines, whenever his paternal wisdom shall see us buying too many shovels, or too many coats, or too much champagne—and thus bring the entire industry of the country under his control."

"It remains to speak of the remedy of these evils. They follow obviously the causes of them. The causes are the injudicious transfers of the public moneys, and the Treasury order about specie."

"The first measure of relief, therefore, should be the instant repeal of the Treasury order requiring specie for lands; the second, the adoption of a proper system to execute the distribution law."

"These measures would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and repose in at least as many days. If the Treasury will not adopt them voluntarily, Congress should immediately command it."

From these documents, said Mr. B. and from the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) the charges which are made against President Jackson, and on which this resolution is supported, and for which the rescission of the Treasury order is demanded, are, first, a violation of the laws; secondly, a violation of the constitution; thirdly, a destruction of the prosperity of the country. Mr. B. would join issue upon each of these charges, and take each by itself, and all in their turn: and first of the illegality. This charge was bottomed upon the alleged contravention of the joint resolution of April, 1816, for the better collection of the public revenue, and although partly set out both in the Kentucky speech, and in the Philadelphia letter, he preferred to read it entire, as the first part, though merely directory, yet was directory in the essential particular of showing who was to be the active agent in carrying the resolution into effect.

The joint resolution of 1816.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States; and that, from and after the 20th day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money, accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid, on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

This is the law, continued Mr. B. and nothing can be plainer than the right of selection which it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury. Four different media are mentioned in which the revenue may be collected, and the Secretary is made the actor, the agent, and the power, by which the collection is to be effected. He is to do it in one, or in another. He may choose several, or all, or two, or one. All are in the disjunctive. No two are joined together, but all are disjoined, and presented to him individually and separately. It is clearly the right of the Secretary to order the collections to be made in either of the four media mentioned. That the resolution is not mandatory in favor of any one of the four, is obvious from the manner in which the notes of the Bank of the United States are mentioned. They were to be received as then provided for by law; for the bank charter had then just passed; and the 14th section had provided for the reception of the notes of this institution until Congress, by law, should direct otherwise. The right of the institution to deliver its notes in payment of the revenue, was anterior to this resolution, and always held under that 14th section, never under this joint resolution; and when that section was repealed at the last session of this Congress, that right was admitted to be gone, and has never been claimed since.

The words of the law are clear; the practice under it has been uniform and uninterrupted from the date of its passage to the present day. For twenty years, and under three Presidents, all the Secretaries of the Treasury have acted alike. Each has made selections, permitting the notes of some specie paying banks to be received, and forbidding others. Mr. Crawford did it in numerous instances; and fierce and universal as were the attacks upon that eminent patriot, during the Presidential canvass of 1824, no human being ever thought of charging him with illegality in this respect. Mr. Rush twice made similar selections during the administration of Mr. Adams; and no one, either in the same cabinet with him, or out of the cabinet against him, ever complained of it. For twenty years the practice has been uniform; and every citizen of the west knows that that practice was the general, though not universal exclusion of the western specie paying bank paper from the western land offices. This every man in the west knows, and knows that that general exclusion continued down to the day that the Bank of the United States ceased to be the depository of the public moneys. It was that event which opened the door to the receivability of State bank paper, which has since been enjoyed.

Mr. B. then approached an argument which he deemed authoritative in this case: it was the 24th article of the Rules and Regulations of the Bank of the United States for the government of their branches. It was made since the passage of the joint resolution of 1816, and related to the collection of the revenue of the United States. It made short work with the notes of the specie paying banks of the States, excluding the notes of the whole of them from all branches of the revenue, except of such banks as might be situated in the same place where the branch bank was situated. The notes of those branches alone were to be received in payment; if the Secretary of the Treasury required others to be received, they would not be taken in payment, but merely noted as a special deposit at the instance of the Government. This is the article:

"ARTICLE XXIV.—The offices of discount and deposit shall receive in payment of the revenue of the United States, the notes of such State banks as redeemed their engagements with specie, and provided they are the notes of banks located in the city, or place, where the office receiving them is established. And also the notes of such other banks as a special deposit on behalf of the Government, as the Secretary of the Treasury may require."

Here, said Mr. B. is selection, a selection by which a few State banks, in no event exceeding those in twenty-five places, for there were never more than twenty-five branches—would have their notes received, while the mass of the State banks, amounting to many hundreds, were entirely cut off. The legality of this selection and exclusion has never been questioned; yet there are persons who deny to President Jackson the right of making the same selection; and who must stand before the public as denying to the President of the United States the power over the execution of the laws which they concede to the President of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. B. said, that it might well be supposed that he had now sufficiently repelled this charge of illegality. He certainly deemed the charge sufficiently answered; but he had other arguments yet to use; arguments belonging to that authoritative class to which he had alluded, and from which the gentlemen making the charge cannot be allowed to appeal. It would be recollected, he said, that about a dozen years ago a committee of the House of Representatives had been raised to investigate certain charges against the then Secretary of the Treasury, that hunted down and persecuted citizen, William H. Crawford. These charges happened to involve the point now in discussion, not as a charge, but incidentally and historically; and among the members of that committee there happened to be a gentleman who was the author of the joint resolution of 1816, who is now a member of this body, (Mr. Webster,) and who has signified an intention to speak in this debate. That committee made a report, purporting to be the unanimous opinion of the body; and from that report, an extract will now be read:

"At the time of the adoption of this resolution, (joint of 1816,) debts accruing to the United States, whether on account of the sales of public lands, or at the custom house, or from any other source of revenue, were in fact received in some parts of the country, but evidently in disregard of the law, in the notes of the State banks which did not redeem their paper by cash payments. By this resolution it was obviously made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to correct that departure from law as soon as practicable; and it was, as is equally obvious, imperative on the Department, after the 20th of February, 1817, to allow nothing to be received in payment of debts due to the United States, but the legal money of the United States. Treasury notes, notes of the Bank of the United States, or those of State banks, the notes of which were payable and paid on demand in specie. The Bank of the United States was incorporated in April, 1816, &c. In the early part of the year 1817, it is represented by the Secretary, and appears to be true, than an arrangement was made with the Bank of the United States, by which the public funds were to be deposited in the branches of that institution in all places where such branches existed, and where there were no such branches, that bank was to designate certain State banks for which it would be responsible, and in which such public moneys would be deposited; and notes of all banks which the Bank of the United States would receive in deposit as cash, AND NONE OTHER, were to be received on sales of public lands. It is further represented that, in the execution of this arrangement, difficulties and controversies arose between the United States Bank and the State banks thus employed in receiving the deposits of the public moneys; and ere long, the Bank of the United States signified to the Department of the Treasury, that it could not continue such arrangement; and that thereforeforward it could receive nothing in deposit, as cash, but the LEGAL CURRENCY OF THE COUNTRY, or its own notes. The agreement with the Bank of the United States terminated, for these reasons, on the 30th of June, 1818. About this period also, the Bank of the United States issued orders prohibiting its WESTERN branches from issuing any of their own notes for circulation, even in exchange for, or on deposit of specie."

"That institution (the Bank of the United States,) is indeed bound to give the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place; but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound also to receive money on deposit for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposit as cash, the bills of any bank whatever but its own. ALTHOUGH they may come within the provisions of the act of 1816."

This, Mr. President, continued Mr. B. was in 1824. It was eight years after the joint resolution of 1816 had passed, and two years after the author of the letter to Mr. Adams, which has been read, came to the presidency of that institution. It is, therefore, the report of transactions to which he was privy and party. The report speaks historically, in reciting an agreement between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Directors of the Bank of the United States, by which, among other things, the selection of the State bank notes receivable in payment of the public lands, was to be left to the Bank of the United States, and NONE should be so received except such as that bank would agree to credit as specie; that afterwards the bank receded from that agreement, and refused to receive ANY STATE BANK NOTES WHATEVER, taking nothing but gold and silver coin, and its own notes; and finally refused to issue its own notes in the WEST, even in exchange for specie! and thus left nothing but specie to be received; and after making these recitals, the committee conclude with the expression of their own opinion of the law, that the Bank of the United States was not bound to receive in deposit as cash, the bills of any State bank whatever, ALTHOUGH THEY COME UNDER THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT OF 1816.

These are the recitals, and this is the opinion of that committee; and certainly they are correct, both in the narration and in the judgment. What then becomes of this charge of illegality in the Woodford speech, and this letter to Mr. Adams, thus confuted and invalidated by the conduct of the bank itself? And what becomes of the pretended injury of all those western banks in having their notes excluded under an order from President Jackson, when they had been previously excluded for nearly twenty years under the orders of the President of the Bank of the United States? Why not complain before? Why not apply to Congress to rescind the order of the bank president, as they now apply for the rescission of the order of the President of the Union; and the politicians and presses which have lavished denunciations upon President Jackson, and wept salt tears over the wrongs of these banks, and the oppressions of the people, on account of the exclusive privilege which had been given to that institution was taken away. The resolution, if it does not in terms repeal the fourteenth section of the bank charter, practically renders that section to the bank itself unimportant, and imposed upon the bank new obligations under the charter extremely onerous, and of great hazard to the interests of that institution. This never was, it never could have been, intended. The law was not, in terms, changed by the resolution; and if the resolution, having the effect of law, is imperative and mandatory in this particular, then, most clearly, it follows that it must be general in its operations; it cannot be in force in Boston, and of no effect in Baltimore; and yet it has been admitted that the collector at New Orleans would not be bound to receive a bill of a specie paying bank issued in New Hampshire. This admission, correct in point of fact, gives to this measure its true character. It clearly shows that the framer of this resolution himself did not regard it as an absolute provision of law, but rather as a matter of practice, which was to be confided to the sound discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Bank of the United States was to receive in deposit the money of the Government; and it was bound to transfer, from place to place, without charge, the public funds; and yet, as I have before said, immediately after the passage of the joint resolution of 1816, the bank itself refused to receive or deposit the bills of specie-paying banks, and pass them to the general credit of the Government, and to transfer them, without charge, as a part and portion of the public funds. The Senator from Massachusetts, in his report in the case of Mr. Crawford, says:

"That institution (the United States Bank) is indeed bound to give necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place; but this can only mean cash funds; and it is bound also to receive money in deposit for the United States; but it is not bound to receive in deposit, as cash, the bills of any banks whatever but its own, although they may come within the provisions of the resolution of 1816." And thus the course of the bank was justified, and its proceeding never called forth any action of Congress expressive of its disapprobation. But how could such a course of proceeding be justified if the bills of State banks paid in specie on demand were by law added to the currency of the country? If the receivers were bound at all events to take the bills of specie-paying banks in payment for public lands and for customs, the United States Bank were also bound to receive them in deposit. They went to make up a part of the public funds of the Government; and yet receivers were justified in not taking the bills of specie-paying banks in payment for the public dues, and the Bank was justified in refusing to receive them in deposit, and of transferring them as a part of the funds of the Government without charge. This is wholly irreconcilable with the idea, and with the fact, that such bills had been legalized, absolutely and unqualifiedly, as currency.

The resolution could not in any way affect the power of the President over the subject. He was bound to see the laws faithfully executed. The laws remained unaltered, the same after as before the resolution. The power and the duty of the President was the same after as before the resolution.

The construction which I have now given to the resolution of 1816, has been given to it not only by public officers, but that construction has been sustained by Congress, with reference to this subject, from that time to the present, and not until this period has the correctness of this construction, and of the corresponding practice of the Government, been questioned.

In a report to the Senate, made by the present Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress, he remarked, that, according to a construction adopted by Mr. Hamilton, "the Treasury into which the money was to be eventually paid, as the chief pecuniary agent of the Government, could waive its right to specie, and could consent to receive the notes of State banks, when deemed by it in all respects equivalent to specie; and by the joint resolution of Congress in 1816, which impliedly gave some sanction to this original practice, by prohibiting the Treasury Department longer to receive the notes of State banks not paying specie, and which it had in the great emergencies of the war allowed to be taken for public dues. The clause in the joint resolution of 1816, not forbidding the receipt of notes of State banks paying specie, has not been understood as amounting to an express grant of power, making those State notes a tender for public dues; else the explicit favor granted to the United States bank notes alone would have been nugatory."

Mr. Crawford, in 1817, after the establishment of the United States Bank, issued circulars prohibiting United States officers from receiving any bills which will not be received by them and credited as cash—and why was this? It will be recollected that by the 16th section of the charter, the money of the United States was to be deposited in the bank and its branches. This charter had been accepted, and the corporation had gone into operation under it, and was bound to receive in deposit the money, the legal currency, of the country; but among its first acts, as I have before said, was an unconditional refusal to receive on general deposit the bills of State Banks, even the bills of those State Banks payable and paid on demand in specie. It results from this fact, that the Bank of the United States considered that the bills of local banks, be their character ever so good, were not money, were not legal currency which they were bound to take in deposit, and hence this circular of Mr. Crawford became necessary.

In 1826 Mr. Rush extended this indulgence to certain enumerated State banks—not to all the specie paying banks of the country, but to certain specified banks; but enjoined that "as the receipt of any of the local or State bank notes may be discontinued at any time without previous notice, it will be well for those who have payments to make, to provide themselves with specie, or notes of the United States Bank or its branches, to guard against change that may be found proper in regard to the notes of the local or State banks."

If that joint resolution of 1816 was imperative and obligatory, it is somewhat surprising that it should have received such a commentary from the head of the Treasury Department.

Mr. Taney, the late Secretary of the Treasury, issued a circular dated March 26, 1834, in which he says:

"Reports occasionally reach Washington, unfavorable to the credit of particular State banks. Many of these rumors are, no doubt, without foundation; but it is the duty of public officers to be continually watchful of the public interests, and it therefore is expected that you will be careful to receive the notes of no banks except such as are in good credit, and pay specie promptly for their notes when presented; and you are to receive none except such as the bank in which you deposit will agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; and, in order to remove all possible grounds of controversy or complaint, you will immediately, on the receipt of this letter, obtain from the bank in which you deposit, a list of the State banks whose notes they will consent to receive and pass to the credit of the United States as above mentioned."

Repudiating the idea that receivers were bound at all events, to take the notes of all specie-paying banks in payment, but that the United States Bank formerly, and the deposit banks since, should have the selection "of those whose notes should be received on account of the revenue."

If this joint resolution was absolutely binding, it is difficult to account for the fact, that it has never been observed, but has been disregarded universally, by the fiscal agents of the Government, without calling forth any action of Congress. If it was a right secured to specie paying banks, it is wonderful that not one of those numerous institutions has ever presumed to lay its grievances before Congress, that the agents of the Government had refused to receive its paper in payment of customs, or of lands, which they were bound to do under the joint resolution of 1816.

I cannot then consider the order of the 11th July last as illegal—as against the material binding provisions of the resolution of the 30th April, 1816. I cannot regard the issuing of that order as any assumption of power on the part of the President. And for aught I see, the order must stand, unless the President shall see fit himself to withdraw it; or unless Congress, by its own legislation, shall take away the foundation upon which that order rests—shall pass some law that shall render the order itself inoperative.

In reference to the policy and expediency of that measure, I am free to admit, that a great diversity of opinion is entertained by different portions of the business community. The President says that he directed the issuing of the order with a view to the safety of the public funds, and to the interests of the people generally. No man, unless familiarly acquainted with the state and condition of the banks which had in deposit the public funds, the practices of those institutions with reference to the facilities furnished to the purchasers of the public domain, the amount of the actual sales of the public lands, and the means used in making these acquisitions from time to time, could determine the policy, expediency, or necessity, of such an order as that which was issued on the 11th of July last.

The reasons which induced the President to direct the issuing of the specie circular, are given in the circular, and in the message, and in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me they were reasons in no way conflicting with the constitution or the law. Certainly some of the very reasons had been urged by gentlemen on the other side during the last session of Congress. To save the public domain from passing into the hands of speculators; to prevent an improper use of the public funds in deposit; to check the issues of over-trading banks, and to save the property of the nation, were among the reasons which induced the Executive to send forth the specie circular. And these very considerations were reiterated time and again on this floor in the course of the last session, in relation to the security and safety of the money of the nation then deposited in the State banks.

The President, then, was bound, if the reasons stated were founded in fact, to issue this order, which was to effect the very objects so much desired at the last session—the safety of the public funds, and the preservation of the public domain.

The order could never have been issued from any political considerations—from any desire for individual popularity; every man must have known that its political effect would have been precisely that which has been produced. Higher consideration than a thirst for personal popularity, or for political distinction, must have prompted the President to have issued this order. It was nothing less than a settled conviction that the public interest demanded the measure. He designed it as a mere temporary expedient; and it remains now for Congress to decide whether any thing, and if any thing, what, shall be done in relation to this matter.

I am not, Mr. President, however, so much in favor of an exclusive metallic currency, that I am prepared, at the present time, to agree to any proposition, which shall in effect legislate bank paper out of circulation. I do not believe that it would be wise to establish an exclusive metallic currency as the settled, fixed, and determined policy of this Government. The country is not prepared for such a revolution in its circulating medium. The true interests of the community, require that all such changes should be gradual and progressive. Any violent and extraordinary alteration in the currency of a country, will invariably bring embarrassment, confusion, distress, and ruin. I am not, therefore, for any great alterations at the present time, although I am for adopting such an arrangement as will bring into circulation more specie, and put out of circulation all bank paper of a small denomination. I shall with great readiness, Mr. President, come in aid of any proposition which shall have for its object the introduction of more specie, and of less paper, among us. But to my mind, the time has not arrived when the currency should be exclusively metallic. The whole amount of specie in our country is inadequate for western lands, while it may have due regard to the last, should be calculated to obtain all the advantages which may be derived from the two first classes."

Thus, said Mr. B. the discrimination between settlers and speculators, and between residents and non-residents, is as old as the first plan for the sale of the public lands; and with these distinctions the legislation of Congress has corresponded from that day down to the time when propositions were made for dividing the proceeds of the lands. Up to that day, pre-emptions were granted to settlers; since that day there has been a strenuous opposition to such grants. The new policy is, not to settle the country with meritorious farmers, but to fill the Treasury with paper money for distribution. Formerly settlers were favored; and hence the settled legislation of the country for above forty years. The statute book contains near fifty laws in favor of pre-emptions. They begin in 1792, and continue down to about 1830. Six or eight of these laws were applicable to the State of Ohio, and may easily be found under the head of "pre-emptions," in the volume of laws relating to the public lands. The pre-emption system, thus founded in a distinction resting on the nature of things, recognised in General Hamilton's report, and practised upon for above forty years by Congress, makes two discriminations, one as to classes of purchasers; the other as to price. The pre-emptor was a resident, he paid the minimum price, without competition at auction sales. Now, if these distinctions are unconstitutional, Congress could not make them; if they were unjust or unwise, forty years' legislation would not have recognised them. Sir, said Mr. B. the Treasury circular, in making this discrimination, only conforms to General Hamilton's report, to forty years' legislation, and to the common sense and common justice of all mankind. It has the sanction of reason, law, time, and precedent; and the only reason why it is attacked, is because we live in times when nothing that President Jackson can do, or not do, can escape attack!

Mr. B. having now fully answered, and, as he believed, entirely refuted the legal and constitutional objection to the Treasury order, would take up the other branch of the general charge, namely, the ruinous and pernicious effect of the order upon the banks, business, prosperity, confidence, and industry of the country. The news for all this approaching calamity was given out in advance in the Kentucky speech, and the Philadelphia letter, already referred to; and the fact of its positive advent and actual presence was vouched by the Senator from Ohio (Mr. Ewing) on the last day that the Senate was in session. I do not permit myself (said Mr. B.) to bandy contradictory asseverations, and debatable assertions, across this floor. I choose rather to make an issue, and to test assertion by the application of evidence. In this way I will proceed at present. I will take the letter of the President of the Bank of the United States as being official in this case, and most authoritative in the distress department of this combined movement against President Jackson. He announces, in November, the forthcoming of the national calamity in December; and after charging part of this ruin and mischief on the mode of executing what he ostentatiously styles the distribution law, when there is no such law in the country, he goes on to charge the remainder, being ten-fold more than the former, upon the Treasury order which excludes paper money from the Land Offices. Here is his picture of distress:

"The commercial community were thus taken by surprise. The interior banks making no loans, and converting their Atlantic funds into specie, the debtors in the interior could make no remittances to the merchants in the Atlantic cities, who are thus thrown for support on the banks of those cities at a moment when they are unable to afford relief on account of the very abstraction of their specie to the west. The creditor States not only receive no money, but their money is carried away to the debtor States, who, in turn, cannot use it, either to pay old engagements or to contract new. By this unnatural process the specie of New York and the other commercial cities is piled up in the western States—not circulated, not used, but held as a defence against the Treasury; and while the west cannot use it, the east is suffering for the want of it. The result is, that the commercial intercourse between the west and the Atlantic is almost wholly suspended, and the few operations which are made are burdened with the most extravagant expense. In November, 1836, the interest of money has risen to twenty-four per cent.; merchants are struggling to preserve their credit by ruinous sacrifices; and it costs five or six times as much to transmit funds from the west and southwest, as it did in November, 1835, or '34, or '32. Thus while the exchanges with all the world are in our favor, while Europe is alarmed, and the Bank of England itself uneasy at the quantity of specie we possess, we are suffering, because, from mere mismanagement, the whole ballast of the currency is shifted from one side of the vessel to the other."

"In the absence of good reasons for these measures, and as a pretext for them, it is said that the country has overtraded, that the banks have overissued, and that the purchasers of public lands have been very extravagant. I am not struck by the truth or the propriety of these complaints."

"Now the fact is, that at this moment, the exchanges are all in favor of this country—that is, you can buy a bill of exchange on a foreign country cheaper than you can send specie to that country. Accordingly, much specie has come in—none goes out; this, too, at a moment when the exchange for the last crop is exhausted, and that of the new crop has not yet come into the market—and when we are on the point of sending to Europe the produce of the country, to the amount of eighty or one hundred millions of dollars. How, then, has the country overtraded? Exchange with all the world is in favor of New York."

"The People of the United States, through their representatives, rechartered that institution. But the Executive, discontented with its independence, rejected the act of Congress, and the favorite topic of declamation was, that the States would make banks, and that these banks could create a better system of currency and exchanges. The States accordingly made banks; and then followed idle parades about the loans of these banks, and their large dealings in exchange. And what is the consequence? The Bank of the United States has not ceased to exist more than seven months, and already the whole currency and exchanges are running into inextricable confusion, and the industry of the country is burdened with extravagant charges on all the commercial intercourse of the Union."

"In the mean time, all forbearance and calmness should be maintained. There is great reason for anxiety—none whatever for alarm; and with mutual confidence and courage, the country may yet be able to defend itself against the Government. In that struggle my own poor efforts shall not be wanting. I go for the country, whoever rules it—I go for the country, best loved when worst governed—and it will afford me far more gratification to assist in repairing its wrongs, than to triumph over those who inflict them."

Here (said Mr. B.) is a woful picture of distress, drawn in the same colors in which the same pictures were drawn in 1833. But is it a true picture? and if it is true, what has caused it? To these questions the answers are plain; first, that the picture is not true, except in places where the Bank of the United States, and its affiliated banks, have power to make it so; and secondly, that whatever real distress is felt in some places, is occasioned by the deposit act of the last session, and the conduct of the banks acting with politicians and with the Bank of the United States. The general prosperity of the country is great; but there are places, Philadelphia, New York, and some others, where the withdrawal of money under the deposit act has occasioned a pressure, and where the policy to create distress, and to throw it upon the Treasury order, is seconded by the ability to accomplish what is desired. This is about the true state of the question; and evidence will be at hand to show it. Mr. B. said it would be remembered that when this resolution was called up a few days ago, he had specified his intention to obtain from the Treasury Department the comparative returns of many banks, both in the new States, where there were public lands, and in the Atlantic States, where there were none; and by looking into their condition before the Treasury order was issued, and since that order had gone into full operation, he would be able to see in what manner the banks had been affected by it. He had now obtained those returns. They, of course, were limited to the deposit banks; but being scattered over every State in the west, from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and throughout the Atlantic States from Maine to Georgia, the result which they would present could not be otherwise than a fair index to the general condition of the whole country. He had looked carefully over these returns, covering, as they did, eight large folio pages, and the result indicated, not only a good condition, but an improved condition; not only an ability to aid the community, but aid actually given. Mr. B. then went over the returns one by one, taking, for his points of comparison, the months of July and November; that is to say, the month before the order went into operation, and the latest month at which the banks had been heard from since. He examined them under the three heads of 1. Loans; 2. Specie on hand, and 3. Circulation; and the general results were, that the loans in November were larger than in July; the specie greater in November than

July; the circulation in many instances not diminished, in some increased; and in most instances the specie on hand and the circulation brought to a nearer proportion to each other; inasmuch that banks which had eight, ten, or twelve dollars of paper out for one dollar of silver in their vaults, in July, were now brought to the safer proportion of three or four to one in November. This was proof that the banks were not crippled. It was proof that they were not denying accommodations. The proof was complete as far as it went, and it went all over the Union, that these banks were not injured by the Treasury order, but were benefitted by it; it was proof that they were not only able and willing to assist the community, but actually had assisted them. On the other hand there might be banks which were not assisting the community, and which were accomplishing a pecuniary and a political object at the same time, by shutting their doors upon borrowers, and throwing them into the hands of money dealers at three per cent. discount per month. This was said to be the case in Philadelphia; that Philadelphia which was the seat of the new United States Bank, with her capital of thirty-five millions, which one short year ago was to make money so plenty in that State, and to reduce interest to five per cent. per annum. Three per cent. discount, equal to four per cent. interest, is now the rate of usury which prevails around her! And she can make it six or twelve per cent. per month whenever she pleases. Where banks have monopolized the currency, and become the dispensers of money, they can make interest, or usury, what they please. They have only to stop discounts, and throw the borrowers into the hands of usurers. Pretexes will never be wanting. Any thing that happens, or does not happen, will do. The removal of the deposits—the issuance of the Treasury order—or, the last year's snow. One thing is as good as another; for the banks themselves are the sole judges of their own reasons, decide without argument, and without appeal, and act upon the decision without mercy and without remorse.

This is now going on in some of the principal cities, where the deposit act, creating a real pressure, gives to the Bank of the United States and its affiliated institutions the power to do great mischief. Of this power they avail themselves; but their sphere of action is limited, not general. Their victims are individuals, and not the Union. They destroy individuals, or, at most, isolated communities. At the most, they only do a Goliath business—kill the prisoners; that is to say, the debtors—a pen-full, or a pail-full, at a time. The debtor part of the community, where the powers of the Bank of the United States and its associates predominate, suffer severely and cruelly, but the remoter parts of the Union are safe. The Briarian arms of the monster no longer reach to the extremities of the Union. It can no longer strike down exchanges, sink the price of produce and property, and demolish merchants and traders, in the towns and cities of the south and west. The tragedy of 1833, now performing on the local theatres of some of the Atlantic cities, cannot be again extended to the country towns and remote States.

Mr. B. remarked, upon the statements in Mr. Bidle's letter; he chose to refer to that letter as being the revealed source of this proceeding against President Jackson, and the fountain from which all the arguments of the opposition are drawn; he remarked upon the statements in it, that it was the great transfer of specie to the west, which occasioned distress in the east; that much specie had gone to the west, and that NONE had been exported. Mr. B. said he had prepared himself with facts to reply to these two assertions. In the first place, a Treasury return which he held in his hand, showed that no more than $1,463,656 in specie had been received at all the land offices under the Treasury order, and a like return showed that $312,841 in gold, and $1,123,004 in silver had been exported from the United States this year. Here then was an export of specie to foreign countries of three times the amount of that which went into the land offices; yet the public are to be told by the president of the bank bearing the name of the United States, that no specie had been exported!

It is in this way that the public is deceived, and that the Treasury order is made the pack-horse, to be loaded with every thing that can be heaped upon it. The export of four and a half millions of specie to foreign countries is called nothing—is said to be none—while one and a half millions, gone into our land offices, has upset the national ship, and deranged the business of a continent! One million and a half out of seventy-five millions has gone into the land offices. Who would feel it? How could it disturb the business of the country? And, especially, how could one million and a half, by going into the interior of our own country, do all this mischief, when four and a half millions, by going to foreign countries, is not felt or known? But there was another operation in specie of which Mr. B. had been informed, and which he should bring under the inquiries of a committee, if he should be so fortunate as to be allowed one, and which he mentioned now, not as evidence to convince the Senate, but as a ground for demanding a committee. His information was this: that in the month of September last, the merchants and bankers of New Orleans became suddenly surprised at the mysterious scarcity of specie. It had vanished as if by magic. A meeting was held to know what had become of it; and it was ascertained that the Bank of the United States had collected and boxed up $1,800,000 in that city, and refused a dollar of it to her creditors there! and that a bank holding $300,000 of her notes, had to send them, and did send them, to Philadelphia to be cashed, at great expense; and, what was more material, at great loss of time, when the city was otherwise pressed for specie by the double cause of demands to supply the western land purchasers, and failure to receive the accustomed supplies from Mexico, on account of the Texan war. Here, then, was $300,000 more taken out of circulation by the Bank of the United States in one month, than all the land offices received in four months; and if the fact was true, as related to him, the evidence was clear and incontestable, that this bank was itself making the scarcity and pressure which it has been falsely throwing upon the Treasury order, and upon President Jackson. Mr. B. asked no one to condemn the bank unheard upon this statement; but he also asked that no one would refuse to have it inquired into by a committee.

The real cause of the pecuniary pressure, and derangement of the exchanges, experienced in some of the large cities, exclusive of that created by some of the banks, was the deposit act of the last session. That act causes thirty odd millions of dollars, about fifteen millions of which is money appropriated to useful and essential objects, to be suddenly withdrawn from the vortex of business, and transferred to places where it must stagnate for some time before it can come again into active employment. Aware of this, and sensible that the public eye was fixed upon this act as the real source of a bona fide distress, the attempt is made to turn off the effect from the act itself, to the mode of its execution. It is not the transfer of these thirty odd millions, they say, which has done the mischief; but the manner of making the transfer! This (said Mr. B.) is a repetition of the old song about the removal of the deposits. It was not the removal, but the manner of the removal, which had done all the mischief in 1833. And when pressed to explain what was this mystical manner of acting, which was so magically calamitous, the solution was in the destruction of confidence. This was the solution then; it is the solution now; for the President of the Bank of the United States expressly declares, that the instant recission of the Treasury order would restore confidence in twenty-four hours, and relief in as many days. This was the declaration during the whole panic of 1833; and its meaning then, and now, is the same; that the Bank of the United States and its affiliated institutions would cease scourging the country the instant the Congress would grant its president the victory and triumph which he demands over President Jackson! The six months' cry of session 1833-4, was, that the restoration of the deposits, or the recharter of the bank, would relieve the distress in twenty-four hours, and that nothing else ever could relieve it. Now it happens, that the test of time, and the letter of the President of the Bank of the United States, has shown that this cry of six months' duration was entirely erroneous; for the distress did cease, and unbounded prosperity has ensued; while the only condition on which this was to take place has never happened; the deposits are not restored; the bank is not rechartered; the distress did cease; unexampled prosperity has ensued; which is attempted to be interrupted again by those who interrupted it then.

Mr. B. said, the deposit act was the offspring of the land bill, and became the substitute for it. That bill had passed the Senate before the deposit bill was brought in, and, so far as the Senate was concerned, had made a previous disposition of the same money. That bill was carried through the Senate by the votes of those who are considered as the tutelary deities of the merchants and bankers on this floor; yet the disposition which it proposed to make of what was called the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, was ruinous to the banks and the merchants of the great Atlantic cities. It made a call for money, and a distribution of money, which must have driven every debtor to these banks to the immediate payment of every shilling which he owed in any deposit bank; and would have produced a pressure and consternation which would have pervaded the whole moneyed system, and the whole business community of the places where they were. This is the provision of the bill. It is the third section, in the form in which it passed the Senate, and went to the House of Representatives.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money received in the Treasury as the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-three, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, and eighteen hundred and thirty-five, shall be paid and distributed as aforesaid, at the Treasury of the United States, one fourth part on the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and one fourth part at the end of each ninety days thereafter, until the whole is paid, and those which shall be received for the years eighteen hundred and thirty-six and eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, shall also be paid at the Treasury half-yearly, on the first day of July and January, in each of those years, to such person or persons as the respective Legislatures of the said States shall authorize and direct to receive the same."

Now, (said Mr. B.) let any banker or merchant of the great commercial cities, count up the sums which would have been payable in the short period of nine months under this act. They would have been these: eighteen millions and three quarters of a million of dollars, on the 1st day of July last; six millions on the 1st day of October last; eighteen millions and three quarters on the 1st day of January next; and six millions on the 1st day of April next; amounting in the whole to forty-nine and one-half million of dollars; for such was the amount of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years mentioned up to 1835. But the section also included the proceeds of the sales for 1837, which were to be divided out on the first days of July 1837 and January 1838. Their amount cannot be known so as to be added. The Secretary of the Treasury, on the basis of hard money payments, estimates them at five millions of dollars; but if these resolutions pass, and the notes of all the banks in the Union become receivable for public lands, the whole national domain may be swept. Every acre may be changed into paper, and that paper be added to the mass of the unavailable funds now in the Treasury.

Mr. B. deemed it right to bring these facts to the recollection of the Senate, and to place them before the eyes of those who looked upon the authors of such measures as their peculiar protectors. That third section of the land bill would have been desolation to the great cities; it was opposed as such on this floor; yet it passed this chamber, but hung in the House of Representatives until the deposit bill was passed here and sent down to supersede it. That deposit bill, which proposes only thirty odd millions for abstraction from the great channels of commerce, is, in reality, crippling banks and merchants and distressing the great cities. What, then, would it have been, if forty nine and a half millions had been taken from them in the short space of nine months? And what would have been its effect upon the Treasury of the United States? Bankruptcy! For it is now seen that there will be in the Treasury on the first of January next, but about forty-one million of dollars, and that inclusive of fifteen millions of unexpended balances, applicable to objects of great necessity, and not completed. Let these facts and these views be kept in mind, whenever the land bill and the deposit act are mentioned.

Mr. B. had a question to put to the defenders of the banks which affected to be crippled and half killed, and unable to lend a dollar, on account of this Treasury order. It was this: How comes it that these banks never felt a wound, nor uttered a complaint, during the many years in which their paper was excluded from both branches of the revenue of the Federal Government, by the by-laws of the Bank of the United States? Mr. B. had read, for another purpose, the 24th article of the by-laws of this corporation, by which the notes of all the local banks of the Union were excluded from receivability in any revenue payment whatever, except the notes of the specie-paying banks in the same city or place where the branch bank was situated. He would now read the 25th article of the same bank code, which would show that this exception in favor of the local banks in the same place with the branch, was of no advantage to them, but the contrary, as it merely amounted to a collection of their notes for immediate convertibility into coin. The article is in these words:

"ARTICLE XXV. The offices of discount and deposit shall, at least once every week, settle with the State banks for their notes, received in payment of the revenue, or for the engagements of individuals to the bank, so as to prevent the balances due to the office from swelling to an inconvenient amount."

Here said (Mr. B.) is the condition of the whole catalogue of State banks, during the days of the reign of the Bank of the United States. All excluded from revenue payments, both land and customs, except those in the twenty-five places where branch banks were situated, and the few thus excepted called upon for the weekly redemption of their notes. This, in fact, was an exclusion of their paper, and a receipt of their specie alone, and worse to them than a total exclusion; for the nominal reception would cease then to be taken out of the channels of circulation, brought to the branch to meet revenue payments, and thence sent back to their own counters for redemption in coin. And this continued to be the case down to the day of the removal of the deposits. Yet these banks never affected to be unable to do business in this long state of total exclusion from all revenue payments by the power of the Bank of the United States. It is only when one half of the same thing is done by President Jackson that they pretend to be ruined. Mr. B. said it was time for the public to mark the conduct of banks, and to discriminate between those which maintained their course as moneyed institutions, and those which were nothing but shaving shops and political engines. Many banks had so acted as to prove that they were at the beck and nod of politicians, and subservient to the mischievous designs of the Bank of the United States. They were ready to close their doors upon borrowers, at the approach of the elections, and to storm Congress with petitions in favor of any movement of the Bank of the United States. Who can forget their petitions at the veto session, and at the panic session, in which they stooped so low as to pray to have the Bank of the United States kept in existence to rule over them, and prevent them from issuing more notes than they could pay? Who can forget their refusal to receive the public deposits, when that refusal was necessary to help out the Bank of the United States in its attempts to embarrass the Government, and to injure the country? These things, and many others, must be remembered, and marked; and the community and the Government must learn to discriminate between institutions which conduct themselves on business principles, and those which are at the service of politicians, whenever a political effect is to be produced, and at the service of a revengeful institution, whenever it suits her policy to have a panic in the country.

Mr. B. referred to the general state of the country, to prove its general prosperity; he referred to the high prices paid for every thing, to prove that money was not scarce except to those whose engagements compelled them to repair to the banks; he referred to the rates of exchange in the south and west, to prove that the exchanges of the country were good wherever they were beyond the reach of the Bank of the United States; and he stated the contents of letters in his possession from presidents and cashiers of banks in Ohio, Mississippi and Louisiana, to show that there was but one objection to the Treasury order, and that was, that it had not been issued early enough!

Having vindicated the Treasury order from the charges of ILLEGALITY and UNCONSTITUTIONALITY, and shown that it had not been RUINOUS to the country, Mr. B. said he would proceed to show the REASONS for which it had issued, and the BENEFITS which had resulted from it. President JACKSON, it was known, in the exercise of his high constitutional duty to see the laws of the country faithfully executed, had directed the issuing of this order. He stood before the country as its responsible author. As such he had been denounced. As such he was charged with violating the laws, and constitution, and destroying the prosperity of the country. As such he is calumniated in the Philadelphia letter, which calls this order, "the revenge of the President upon Congress for passing the distribution bill." As such, another condemnation, for the gratification of discomfited politicians and a dethroned national bank president—another victory in the Senate Chamber for those who have been defeated at the polls—is now sought against him in this attempt to rescind that order. Under such circumstances it is not only right that he should find defenders, but that he should be heard also in his own defence. Mr. B. would, therefore, refer to the annual message, delivered at the opening of this session of Congress, and point the attention of the Senate, and the country, to the whole of that profoundly wise, transcendently patriotic, and paternally beneficent, part of the message which relates to the general currency, and to the national domain.

Extract from the President's Message.

"I beg leave to call your attention to another subject intimately associated with the preceding one—the currency of the country.

"It is apparent, from the whole context of the constitution, as well as the history of the times which gave birth to it, that it was the purpose of the convention to establish a currency consisting of the precious metals. These, from their peculiar properties, which rendered them the standard of value in all other countries, were adopted in this, as well to establish its commercial standard, in reference to foreign countries, by a permanent rule, as to exclude the use of a mutable medium of exchange, such as of certain agricultural commodities, recognised by the statutes of some States as a tender for debts, or the still more precarious expedient of a paper currency. The last, from the experience of the evils of the issues of paper during the revolution, had become so justly obnoxious as not only to suggest the clause in the constitution forbidding the emission of bills of credit by the States, but also to produce that vote in the Convention which negatived the proposition to grant power to Congress to charter corporations; a proposition well understood at the time as intended to authorize the establishment of a national bank, which was to issue a currency of bank notes, on a capital to be created to some extent out of Government stocks. Although this proposition was refused by a direct vote of the Convention, the object was afterwards in effect obtained by its ingenious advocates, through a strained construction of the Constitution. The debts of the Revolution were funded, at prices which formed no equivalent compared with the nominal amount of the stock, and under circumstances which exposed the motives of some of those who participated in the passage of the act to distrust.

"The facts that the value of the stock was greatly enhanced by the creation of the bank; that it was well understood that such would be the case, and that some of the advocates of the measure were largely benefited by it, belong to the history of the times, and are well calculated to diminish the respect which might otherwise have been due to the action of the Congress which created the institution.

"On the establishment of a national bank, it became the interest of its creditors that gold should be superseded by the paper of the bank as a general currency. A value was soon attached to the gold coins, which made their exportation to foreign countries, as a mercantile commodity, more profitable than their retention and use at home as money. It followed as a matter of course, if not designed by those who established the bank, that the bank became, in effect, a substitute for the mint of the United States.

"Such was the origin of a national bank currency, and such the beginning of those difficulties which now appear in the excessive issues of the banks incorporated by the various States."

"The effects of an extension of bank credits and over-issues of bank paper have been strikingly illustrated in the sales of the public lands. From the returns made by the various registers and receivers in the early part of last summer, it was perceived that the receipts arising from the sales of the public lands were increasing to an unprecedented amount. In effect, however, these receipts amounted to nothing more than credits in banks. The banks lent out their notes to speculators; they were paid to the receivers, and immediately returned to the banks, to be lent out again and again, being mere instruments to transfer to speculators the most valuable public land, and pay the Government by a credit on the books of the banks. Those credits on the books of some of the western banks, usually called deposits, were already greatly beyond their immediate means of payment, and were rapidly increasing. Indeed, each speculation furnished means for another: for no sooner had one individual or company paid in their notes, than they were immediately lent to another for a like purpose; and the banks were extending their business and their issues so largely, as to alarm considerate men, and render it doubtful whether bank credits, if permitted to accumulate, would ultimately be of the least value to the Government. The spirit of expansion and speculation was not confined to the deposit banks, but pervaded the whole multitude of banks throughout the Union, and was giving rise to new institutions to aggravate the evil.

"The safety of the public funds, and the interests of the people, generally, required that these operations should be checked, and it became the duty of every branch of the General and State Governments to adopt all legitimate and proper means to produce that salutary effect. Under this view of my duty, I directed the issuing of the order which will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring payment for the public lands sold to be made in specie, with an exception until the fifteenth of the present month in favor of actual settlers. This measure has produced many salutary consequences. It checked the career of the western banks, and gave them additional strength in anticipation of the pressure which has since pervaded our western as well as the European commercial cities. By preventing the extension of the credit system, it measurably cut off the means of speculation, and retarded its progress in monopolizing the most valuable of the public lands. It has tended to save the new States from a non-resident proprietorship, one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of a new country, and the prosperity of an old one. It has tended to keep open the public lands for entry by emigrants, at Government prices, instead of their being compelled to purchase of speculators at double or triple prices. And it is conveying into the interior large sums in silver and gold, there to enter permanently into the currency of the country, and place it on a firmer foundation. It is confidently believed that the country will find, in the motives which induced that order, and the happy consequences which will have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn.

Mr. B. said it would be observed by the Senate that the reasons for issuing the Treasury order are introduced by the President under the head of currency, and not under the head of public lands; and that in his whole manner of treating it, the currency is the object, and the land the incident. The regulation of the currency is the great object; and as the lands, and not the custom house, was the exciting cause of the swollen, bloated, and diseased state of the currency, the remedy was directed to the lands, and not to the customs. All this is visible in the passages read. It is also visible in the original Treasury order itself, where the discouragement of the ruinous extension of bank issues, the preservation of the soundness of the currency, and the safety of the federal revenue, are distinctly and prominently set forth among the high inducements to its issue. Very rightly, then, did the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) express himself on Thursday last, in the few remarks which he then made: very rightly did he declare this to be a currency question, and not a land question! a financial measure of the greatest moment and extent, affecting every interest and the whole Union! and rightly did he claim for it that high consideration which is due to a measure, not of sectional, but of national concern. The gentleman is right. The Treasury order is a regulation of the national currency, issued under the constitutional obligation of the President to preserve and protect the currency of the Federal Government, and exercised according to the manner pointed out by the author of the joint resolution of 1816, and according to the manner, though not to the same degree, that the regulation of the currency was effected by the Bank of the United States during the whole period of its existence. The constitution recognises nothing for money but gold and silver. The President is the sworn protector, defender, and preserver of that constitution. To permit any part of its guaranties to be subverted and destroyed, is a dereliction of duty or a defect of vigilance in him. The joint resolution of 1816 does not grant, but recognises and enforces, his constitutional duties and powers over the preservation of the constitutional currency. The author of that resolution, in the speech from which I have read extracts—a speech abounding with just sentiments, recognises all this authority, and proclaims all this duty, of the President, as attributes of the Executive Government, existing anteriorly to his resolution; a measure only rendered necessary because these powers and duties had been neglected. Listen to him: "There are some political evils which are seen as soon as they are dangerous, and which alarm at once, as well the people as the Government. Wars and invasions, therefore, are not always the most certain destroyers of national prosperity. They come in no questionable shape. They announce their own approach, and the general safety is preserved by the general alarm. Not so with the evils of a debased coin, a depreciated paper currency, and a depressed and falling public credit. Not so with the plausible and insidious mischief of a paper money system. These insinuate themselves in the shape of facilities, accommodation and relief. They hold out the most fallacious hope of an easier payment of debts, and a lighter burden of taxation. It is easy for a portion of the people to imagine that Government may properly continue to receive depreciated paper, because they have received it, and because it is more convenient to obtain than to obtain other paper or specie. But on these subjects it is that Government ought to exercise its own peculiar wisdom and caution. It is supposed to possess, on subjects of this nature, somewhat more of foresight, than has fallen to the lot of individuals. It is bound to foresee the evil before every man feels it, and to take all necessary measures to guard against it, although they may be measures attended with some difficulty, and not without some temporary inconvenience. The only power which the Government possesses of restraining the issues of the State banks, is to refuse their notes in the receipts of the Treasury. This power it can exercise now, or, at least, can provide now for exercising it in reasonable time, because the currency of some part of the country is yet sound, and the evil is not yet universal. But I have expressed my belief on more than one occasion; and I now repeat the opinion, that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the return of peace, to have returned to the legal and proper mode of collecting the revenue. This Government has a right, in all cases, to protect its own revenues, and to guard them against bad and depreciated paper. As to the opinion advanced by some, that the object of the resolution cannot in any way be answered; that the revenues cannot be collected otherwise than they now are, in the paper of any and every banking association that chooses to issue paper, it cannot, for a moment, be admitted. The thing then is to be done; at any rate, it is to be attempted. That it will be accomplished by the Treasury Department, without the interference of Congress, I have no belief. If, from that source, no reformation came when reformation was easy, it is not now to be expected. The great object is that our legal currency is to be preserved, and that we are not to embark on the ocean of paper money. I cannot say, indeed, that this resolution will certainly effect the desired end. It may fail. Its success, as is obvious, must essentially depend on the course pursued by the Treasury Department."

Mr. B. would add nothing by commentary to the power or appositeness of these quotations. They were up to the exigencies of the present occasion, fitted it as if made to order, and superseded the necessity of argument or illustration. One thing ought to be well observed: that this speech, going the whole length, not only of justifying the present Treasury order, but blaming the Treasury Department in 1816 for not having done the like, and expressing the fear that it might not do it in time to come, was delivered on the 26th day of April, 1816, four days before the passage of the joint resolution of that year! consequently, and as the whole speech proves, all the powers and duties claimed in that speech for the Treasury Department, and the Executive Government, over the regulation of the currency, the restoration of the constitutional money, and the exclusion of State bank paper from revenue payments, were independent of that resolution! were founded, 1. upon the constitution; 2. the act of 1789, that the customs should be paid in gold and silver coin only; 3, the act of May 10th, 1800—the fundamental act for the general sale of the public lands—and directing that all purchasers should make payment for the same in SPECIE, or in evidences of the public debt of the United States! These were the foundations of the gentleman's argument, these the laws, the violation of which he had in his eye; these the ground of his complaint against the existing administration; these the future ark of his financial hope. These are the laws, faithful expositors of the constitution, in aid of which, and to compel the speedy execution of which, the joint resolution of 1816 was conceived and passed. The author of the resolution said at the time that the success of the resolution depended upon the Treasury Department, and expressed his fear that it might fail of its object through the fault of that department; a fear in which the gentleman's misgivings were prophetic, until the splendid and beneficent administration of President Jackson rose upon the political horizon, to bless and exalt his country; to command the admiration of the world, civilized and barbarian, and to realize the gentleman's own cherished and adored vision of 1816—the constitutional currency restored, and the bloated and pestilential carcass of the paper system expelled from the doors of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BENTON repeated the date of the speech from which he had read an extract; it was the 26th of April, 1816, four days before the passage of the joint resolution of that year. He now had another extract from another speech of the same gentleman, also delivered before that joint resolution was passed, and clearly indicative of his intention in bringing forward that measure, to compel, as soon as possible, the complete re-establishment of the currency of the constitution as the sole and exclusive currency of the Federal Government. It was a speech delivered in February, on the passage of the charter of the Bank of the United States, and in which the speaker took the great and true ground, that the law and Treasury Department, and not the Bank, ought to be the true regulator of currency. Mr. B. only read the parts which were applicable to the point in debate, namely, the legal currency of the United States, and the speedy and compulsory payment of the whole revenue in that currency.

Extract from Mr. Webster's speech on the Bank of the United States Charter Bill, February, 1816.

"No nation had a better currency than the United States. There was no nation which had guarded its currency with more care; for the framers of the constitution, and those who enacted the early statutes on this subject, were HARD MONEY MEN; they had felt, and therefore duly appreciated, the evils of a paper medium; they, therefore, sedulously guarded the currency of the United States from debasement. The legal currency of the United States was gold and silver coin; this was a subject, in regard to which Congress had run into no folly.

Mr. W. declined occupying the time of the House, to prove that there was a depreciation of the paper in circulation; the legal standard of value was gold and silver; the relation of paper to it proved its state, and the rate of its depreciation. Gold and silver currency, he said, was the law of the land at home, and the law of the world abroad; there could, in the present state of the world, be no other currency. In consequence of the immense paper issues having banished specie from circulation, the Government had been obliged, in direct violation of existing statutes, to receive the amount of their taxes in something which was not recognised by law as the money of the country, and which was, in fact, greatly depreciated.

"As to the evils of the present state of things, Mr. W. admitted it in its fullest extent. If he was not mistaken, there were some millions in the Treasury of paper which were nearly worthless, and were now wholly useless to the Government, by which an actual loss of considerable amount must certainly be sustained by the Treasury. This was an evil which ought to be met at once, because it would grow greater by indulgence. In the end, the taxes must be paid in the legal money of the country, and the sooner that was brought about the better.

If Congress were to pass forty statutes on the subject, he said, they would not make the law more conclusive than it now was, that nothing should be received in payment of duties to the Government but specie; and yet no regard was paid to the imperative injunctions of the law in this respect. The whole strength of the Government, he was of opinion, ought to be put forth to compel the payment of the duties and taxes to the Government in the legal currency of the country."

Now (said Mr. B.) the Senate will doubtless be willing to hear what was said by the friends of the administration in 1816, to those powerful appeals from the gentleman, who so strenuously plead the cause of the laws, the constitution and hard money. He had looked over the speeches of that day, and found the whole of their answers compressed into a short paragraph by Mr. Sharpe of Kentucky, a gentleman of genius and ability, and whose tragical death had since attracted so much public notice and commiseration.

"In reply to the argument of Mr. Webster, that the remedy for the evil was in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, by requiring payment of the duties to the Government in specie, Mr. S. said the gentleman had not demonstrated that there was specie enough in the country for the purposes of the payment of the revenue to the Treasury, nor that the banks have not the means ultimately to force the Government to take their paper in payments to the Treasury. The disposition was not wanting in the officer at the head of that department to apply the remedy, if it was in his power."

This was the answer! a deplorable confession of the condition to which the Federal Treasury had been reduced by receiving State bank paper in payment of the federal revenues! That policy had begun under General Hamilton, and followed up by other secretaries, in violation of the laws and Constitution, until nothing but unconvertible paper remained in the Treasury, and little else in the country. All their fine phrases about specie paying banks, and paper equivalent to specie, and no paper but what the collectors and depositors of the revenue would receive as cash; all these holiday phrases had ended as such schemes must for ever end, in the eventual general use of paper, the eventual general banishment of specie, and the eventual general stoppage of banks, and universal depreciation of paper money. This was the only answer which could be given in 1816, and the only one that could be given until President Jackson's measures for restoring the constitutional currency have raised that currency to seventy five millions of dollars. There is now specie enough in the country to make all revenue payments in gold and silver; and the purchasers of the public land, speculators and bank borrowers excepted, have found no difficulty in getting specie to make their payments. Land office returns prove this. The sum of $1,463,656 was paid into the land office, in gold and silver, from the 15th of August, when the order took effect, down to the middle of November, to which the returns were made up. This was a million and a half for three months, being at the rate of about six millions per annum. This would buy near five millions of acres of land at the present minimum price; and five millions of acres of public lands, in addition to other sources of supply, is double as much as the progressive settlement of the country has ever required. Does the demand for this small sum—a sum which does not go out of the country, but enters immediately into general circulation through the Government payments—cannot such a demand be supplied out of the seventy-five millions in the country, especially when four and a half millions were exported to foreign parts this very year, not to return again? Of the seventy-five millions of specie in the country, the banks alone were computed by the Secretary of the Treasury to have forty five millions in their vaults. Can they not spare a few millions for the service of the country, especially when the measures of President Jackson's administration has increased their supplies of the precious metals from twenty-five to forty-five millions in three years? Mr. B. would subjoin from the Treasury report, the statement of specie in all the banks in the United States, as far as obtained at the Treasury Department, first premising that the report was not complete. The number of banks in the United States and their branches, are near 1,000! Their names occupy twelve columns in Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector, with nearly eighty names in each column! The Treasury report does not include them all, but the main part, and their specie is reported thus:

October, 1833,	-	$25,000,000
January, 1834,	-	27,000,000
January, 1835,	-	43,000,000
January, 1836,	-	40,000,000
December, 1836,	-	45,000,000

Here is an increase of specie in their vaults, said Mr. B. of twenty millions in three years, and of five millions of dollars during the very year of the Treasury order's existence! a fact which, of itself, exposes, and puts to shame, the whole story of their distress and ruin, and inability to aid the community on account of this order, or to furnish the specie which it requires. The fact is conclusive! it stamps the whole contrivance on the part of the banks which have engaged in it, as a shameful and fraudulent imposition upon the public. It is enough of itself; but the custom house books show that these banks would in reality have increased their specie to ten millions this year, had it not been for the sums exported to foreign countries. The exports of specie, up to near the end of November, were $4,435,815; of which $312,811 was in gold. But this is nothing, according to the Philadelphia letter. It is nothing; while the one-third of that sum going into our land offices, and thence through Government payments to the people, is to create intense distress, derange the exchanges, deprive the banks which affect to be injured by the Treasury order of all capacity to make loans to business men, and justify them in throwing borrowers into the hands of usurers to be fined at the rate of three per cent. per month discount—equal to four per cent. interest—for the use of money.

But Mr. B. had another test to apply to the capacity of these banks to furnish the small amount of five millions of dollars per annum for the purchase of public lands. It was in the contrast exhibited by the one thousand banks of the United States with what is done by a single banker in the English county—he might almost say kingdom instead of county, for Lancashire, in point of wealth, is equal to the second rate kingdoms of Europe—in the English county of Lancashire, and where there are no local paper-issuing banks or bankers. He would give the sworn words of Samuel Jones Lloyd, Esq. a banker examined before the committee of thirty-one members of the House of Commons in 1832; a committee of which Lord Althorpe was chairman, and such men as Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, Mr. Goulbourn, Sir Henry Parnell, Mr. Baring, and more than two dozen scarcely their inferiors, were members, and in which such men as the Governor of the Bank of England, Mr. N. M. Rothschild, and an hundred distinguished bankers and merchants were witnesses. Mr. Lloyd, among other things, testified to the quantity of gold paid weekly by a single banking establishment, his own, for wages to working people in the city of Manchester, one out of the many great cities which Lancashire contains. This is the part of his evidence relating to this point:

"A great amount in gold is paid at Manchester in wages. Witness's house issues about 25,000 sovereigns weekly. This issue was formerly in one pound notes. There is no local issue in Lancashire."

Here are three statements, (said Mr. B.) which ought to be stereotyped on the head and heart of friend to the constitutional currency of our America. 1. Twenty-five thousand sovereigns paid weekly by one banking house, for wages to working people. 2. This amount formerly paid in one pound notes. 3. No local bank issuing paper now in Lancashire.

Confining his remarks to one only of these statements—the amount of weekly payments in gold, Mr. B. said the annual amount was one million three hundred thousand sovereigns, equal to six millions and a half of dollars! This was paid by a single banking house; and are we to believe that the 1,000 banks in the United States cannot furnish the same amount for the purchase of the public lands? And are we, after attempting to make them do it, to be clamored down by a combined cry from speculations, a part of the banks, and politicians, that the country was paralyzed and desolated by the experiment, and that all further attempt must instantly cease?

Mr. B. would make a short issue with all these complaining banks; they either have, or have not, their proportion of the forty-five millions of specie which they report is in their vaults. If they have it, there is no difficulty in furnishing specie for the land offices; if they have it not, then their returns are deceptive—their periodical exhibitions of specie are nothing but show money; and the sooner the people find out their hollowness and emptiness, the better for the whole community.

But (continued Mr. B.) let the amount of specie be what it may in the banks, the fact is that there is about seventy-five millions in the country, and a goodly part of that is in the hands of the community. In October, 1833, when the deposits were removed, the whole amount of specie in the bank, was returned at about twenty-five millions, and that in the hands of the community was computed 24th Cong....2d Sess.

Recission of the Treasury Order—Mr. Benton.

Senate.

at only four millions. The community is now computed to have twenty-eight millions, and the annual increase is thus reported by the Secretary of the Treasury:

Dates.	Specie in active circulation.
Year.
October, 1833,	$4,000,000
1st January, 1834,	12,000,000
1st January, 1835,	18,000,000
1st January, 1836,	23,000,000
1st December, 1836,	28,000,000

Here then is a sum in the hands of the community, sufficient to supply the public land demand, on account of actual settlers, four times over. The rapidity with which gold and silver has increased since the commencement of the operations to restore the constitutional currency, should banish all doubt on the practicability of doing it. See what has been done in four years against the powerful opposition, the systematic resistance, and the scoffings and jeerings of a great political and moneyed party. Four years more may be equally successful, if these resolutions can be defeated; and instead of seventy-five millions, one hundred and twenty millions, and nearly forty millions of it gold, may be in the country. But nobody expects this amount to come into the country, or what is in it now to remain, unless the Federal Government can continue its onward course in the reformation of the currency. If it relapses into a paper money currency, the whole community must relapse into it also; and the result must be, what it has been heretofore, universal banishment of the precious metals, the eventual stoppage of all the State banks, and a call for the re-establishment of the Bank of the United States as the only safe regulator of the State currencies.

The increase of banks and paper money, and the necessity of restraining the issues of these corporations, as alleged in the President's message, was next adverted to by Mr. B. He referred to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which showed these results:

Dates.	Paper in active circulation.
Near 1 October 1833 -	$80,000,000
1 January 1834 -	76,000,000
1 January 1835 -	82,000,000
1 January 1836 -	103,000,000
1 December 1836 -	120,000,000

Here is an increase of about forty millions of paper money in two years. But it is not the whole increase in that time. The computation is principally made from the returns of the old banks; while one hundred and six new ones, with capitals of sixty millions, had been created; and twelve millions and three quarters of increased capital to the old banks, had been granted during the past winter; so that fifty millions of increase of paper was probably the amount when the Treasury order was issued, and the increase going on with a deplorable rapidity. The national domain was the object that was attracting it. The temptation was irresistible. A quire of paper, speckled over with figures, would transmute into a 100,000 acres of land; a ream of paper into a million of acres. One thousand engines were at work, striking this paper; hosts of speculators, loaded with bales of it, were on their way to all the new States. It was evident the national domain was becoming a fund for the redemption of all this paper. It was all receivable in exchange for lands; and the holders of these bills seem to consider them as assignats, like those of the French National Convention, convertible into the territory of the Republic at the will of the possessor, and the faster the better. This was the state of things on the rise of Congress, and the two halls of that body had resounded with the denunciation of the ruinous aspect of this exchange of land for paper, for months before the adjournment took place. The President, acting under the constitutional laws of the country, applied the remedy which the crisis required, and which the laws and constitution authorized. He saved the national domain; he checked the expansion of the paper system; he saved the Treasury from a frightful accumulation of "unavailable funds;" and he prevented that catastrophe in the State banks to which the Bank of the United States is anxiously looking, systematically promoting, and impatiently awaiting! that catastrophe in the local banks which would again disgrace and discredit them, and bring forth the whole United States Bank party to exclaim, we told you so! we told you this would be the consequence of not renewing our charter! and now you all see it! and we demand the re-establishment of the national bank, as the only means of regulating the State banks! President Jackson has prevented all this; and has shown that the constitutional currency can regulate the State banks; and for this he has drawn upon himself the denunciations of disappointed speculators, disappointed politicians, and disappointed bankers. He has prevented many and great evils, and among others the further depreciation of the currency. Fifty millions of additional paper, put out in two years has enabled the banks to imprison 45 millions of specie, and the whole 130 millions of paper money afloat during the summer has depreciated the general currency; which is seen by the importation of wheat from Germany and the Black sea, by the importation of beef and pork from Ireland, hay from Scotland, and many other necessities of life from Europe; which is seen in the rise of price in every article which depends for its sale on our depreciated currency; for articles whose price depends upon foreign markets, where the notes of our 1,000 banks are not taken for money, as tobacco and cotton have not risen. The progress and the evils of this depreciation, which commenced before the Treasury order—which that order has checked, but which must recommence with its recission, is powerfully sketched in that part of President Jackson's message which relates to the currency. He says:

"The progress of an expansion, or rather a depreciation of the currency, by excessive bank issues, is always attended by a loss to the laboring classes. This portion of the community has neither time nor opportunity to watch the ebb and flows of the money market. Engaged from day to day in their useful toils, they do not perceive that although their wages are nominally the same, or even somewhat higher, they are greatly reduced, in fact, by the rapid increase of a spurious currency, which, as it appears to make money abundant, they are first inclined to consider a blessing. It is not so with the speculator, by whom this operation is better understood, and is made to contribute to his advantage. It is not until the prices of the necessities of life become so dear that the laboring classes cannot supply their wants out of their wages, that the wages rise and gradually reach a justly proportional rate to that of the products of their labor. When thus, by the depreciation, in consequence of the quantity of paper in circulation, wages as well as prices become exorbitant, it is soon found that the whole effect of the debilitation is a tariff on our home industry for the benefit of the countries where gold and silver circulate and maintain uniformity and moderation in prices. It is then perceived that the enhancement of the price of land and labor, produces a corresponding increase in the price of products, until these products do not sustain a competition with similar ones in other countries, and thus both manufactured and agricultural productions cease to bear exportation from the country of this spurious currency, because they cannot be sold for cost. This is the process by which specie is banished by the paper of the banks. Their vaults are soon exalted to pay for foreign commodities; the next step is a stoppage of specie payment—a total degradation of paper as a currency—unusual depression of prices, the ruin of debtors, and the accumulation of property in the hands of creditors and cautious capitalists."

Thus, said Mr. B. is the progress and effect of a depreciated paper currency. The imprudence, or the criminality, of banks of issue, are equally the sources of this depreciation; and the community is equally the victim of their misconduct, whether it results from accident, folly, or design. It is established in England that a sudden increase of one million sterling, by Bank of England issues, will, in many states of the moneyed system, produce a depreciation in the value of money which will be sensibly felt in the kingdom; what, then is to be the effect of an increase of fifty millions of paper dollars, in two years, in this country? It must be what every person sees, and feels it to be; a depreciation of at least one third of the value of paper money! so that every person living on salaries, fixed income, and wages, are in the condition of having suffered a diminution of one-third of their income. Living is becoming as dear in our young and prolific America as in the aged and crowded countries of Europe. Let no one delude himself with the belief that there is no depreciation while bank notes continue to be convertible into gold and silver; this would be a great error; for it is of the very nature of depreciating paper to carry down gold and silver with it, until things reach that point, when prudent men begin to exact payments in hard money, or, which is the same thing, to carry home in silver at night the amount of every note received during the day. When things have reached that point, and about the time when all prudent men have taken care of themselves, the public mind begins to get uneasy. Some cause, no matter what, starts an alarm; and, in a few weeks the explosion is universal. Such was the point to which we were rapidly tending in July last. President Jackson has arrested this depreciation, and saved the country from a dire calamity. His Treasury order has saved it. It has stopped the issues of a host of banks, and bound up the elements of desolation in their own caverns. The raging winds are now imprisoned; Boreas, Eurus, and Auster, are now confined. The fabulous conception of the father of poets is realized, not upon the ocean of waters, but upon the ocean of paper money. The elements of destruction are tied up; and wo to those who, imitating the rash conduct of the companions of Ulysses, shall untie the fated bag, and turn loose tempests, storms, and desolating fury upon the land.

Mr. B. said it would be unjust, after saying so much of the expansion of the paper currency, and the over-issues of the local banks, not to add, that the picture was not intended to be applicable to the whole of these banks; that he knew of many honorable exceptions, and there might be many more that he did not know of. His means of information were limited to the official returns of the deposit banks, now about ninety in number; and while, of these, he saw many whose paper dollars in circulation, to say nothing of their deposits, were five, ten, fifteen to one for their specie dollars in their vaults, yet there were others where the proportion was the other way. The Merchants' Bank, Boston, had $234,000 specie, and $256,000 in circulation; the Bank of America, New York, had $1,490,000 in specie, and $572,000 notes out; the Manhattan, in the same place, had $690,000 specie, and $566,000 paper out; the Planters Bank, Georgia, had $497,000 specie, $361,000 paper; and many others whose issues but slightly exceeded their specie in hand. It was due to these banks, and doubtless to many more, whose returns were not accessible to him, to except them from the censure and the complaint which lies against those whose unjustifiable issues have produced the expansion and depreciation of currency which is now visible to all.

Adverting to President Jackson's great design of increasing the specie in the country, Mr. B. said, there was an indissoluble connection between the state of the specie in a country, and its prosperity or distress. They were cause and effect, and rose and fell together. On this point he had a table to produce which must carry conviction to every mind which was open to the influence of facts and reasons. It was a table which covered the most disastrous, and the most prosperous period of our own time; and which required but the application of every one's own knowledge of events to lead to just and inevitable conclusions.

Here (said Mr. B.) is a period of sixteen years, divided into portions of four years each, by the administrations of different Presidents. The first showed a heavy export of specie, and the loss of near twelve millions of dollars; the second, a loss of about a million and a half; the third, a gain of about six millions; the fourth, a gain of near forty millions, and upwards of that amount when the produce of our native gold mines were added. These were the results; and without embarrassing his remarks with complicated details, he would take the periods of strongest contrast, the first and the last four years of the sixteen. Every person would recollect the period of 1821, '2, '3, '4. It was the season of bank stoppages; of depreciated paper money; of stop laws, relief laws, tender laws, loan laws, property laws—the season of depressed prices of property and produce, of ruin to debtors, and harvests to money holders and cautious capitalists. It was the time when a creditor who should receive from his debtor ten dollars in Kentucky paper and give five silver dollars in change, would have received nothing, and the debtor would have paid nothing. It was the time when two bills for the same article was made out in the west; one for silver, and one for paper, the latter being the former multiplied by two. Now look to the table. This disastrous season will be seen to have been the period of least importation, and greatest exportation of specie. Search the memory, and it will inform you that the Bank of the United States, then just recovered from its own crisis of 1819, and just strong enough to do mischief, was employed in evincing the whole interior country of its gold and silver, and collecting it on the sea board, where it was exported to countries unafflicted with the pestilence of paper money. Look to the last period, the present time; and, it will be seen that, dating from that era which should become national, and receive perennial honors in anniversary celebrations—the most glorious era of the removal of the deposits!—dating from that era, and it will be seen that we have gained near forty millions of specie by importations, and that the gain exceeds forty millions when the domestic supplies are added. The present period, then, is the season of the greatest increase of specie ever known; and such also is the national prosperity. Never before did the prosperity of the country equal the present time; never was there such exuberance of prosperity; and that, after making due allowance for what is fictitious, from the excess of paper, and the effect of a depreciated currency. This excess and depreciation would be fatal, were it not for the twenty-five millions of specie in the country. But these three score and fifteen millions are the safety of the land. They make the people independent of the banks; they make them independent of panics; they prepare them for the present panic, this starveling concern, now in a course of preparation by the authors of the old one. Thanks to the wisdom, the foresight, the energy of President Jackson: he has prepared the country for this second panic; he has fortified it, and armed it for the contest. Seventy-five millions of specie puts paper at defiance, and enables the country to stand the shock of the encounter. No longer can banks set themselves up above law, and above Government. No longer can they stop payment, and force their dishonored paper upon the country. The bank that would now attempt it would instantly be put to the test of insolvency, and subjected to the laws of the land as well as to the law of public opinion. Her dishonored paper would be driven in upon her, and the last hard dollar extracted from her vaults. These being the fruits of President Jackson's great measures for restoring a specie currency, who can justify the opposite course which is now proposed; a course by which specie is to be dispensed with by the Federal Government, paper to take its place, specie again to become an article of merchandise for exportation to foreign countries; and the disastrous scenes of 1821, '2, '3, '4, again realized. The crisis had approached in July; paper was pouring into the Treasury; specie was departing for foreign climes; President Jackson checked the inundation of paper, and he compelled the departing specie to counter-march; to face west instead of east; to our land offices instead of foreign ports; and in doing this, he has benefitted his country, and drawn upon himself the denunciation of those who now attack him.

Mr. B. would conclude his observations on this part of the subject, with calling the attention of the Senate to the public imputation of wicked motives, attributed to President Jackson, in the Kentucky speech and Philadelphia letter, from which extracts had been read. Christian charity forbids, and gentlemanly breeding avoids, the gratuitous imputation of malignant motives. There are cases in which delicacy recoils from a public and insulting reference from one man to another. But where was Christian charity, gentlemanly breeding, or delicacy of feeling, when such words as these were used in reference to President Jackson? "I have little doubt that the specie order was the REVENGE of the President upon CONGRESS for passing the DISTRIBUTION LAW." Here, said Mr. B. is not only a personal outrage to the President, but an attempt to excite the resentment of Congress against him, and to mark him for the vengeance of all who are disposed to pervert the deposit act into a distribution law; and all this, too, upon the gratuitous imputation of a wicked motive for a measure, just, wise, legal, and indispensably necessary within itself! Motives, continued Mr. B. are within the cognizance of the Searcher of all Hearts. He can see them as they are; the mortal eye may mistake them. It is good, then, for frail humanity to be slow in charging a bad motive for even a questionable action; he had, therefore, refrained from all reference to motives for the design of those coincident and twin productions from which he had made quotations, the Kentucky speech and the Philadelphia letter! He had not said that they were the revenge of disappointed ambition, for a lost Presidential chair, nor of disappointed avarice for a lost national bank charter. He had not even intimated that the marble palace in Chestnut street, and the shady groves of Ashland, might be conscious to the embraces from which this rescinding resolution has sprung; or, that the imperative requisition upon this Congress to command the instant repeal of the Treasury order, was founded in any scheme to obtain, from the representatives of the people, a triumph over that MAN to whom the people themselves have granted so many triumphs over the same pursuers. For himself he had omitted all such intimations; and should drop all further notice of them now. Leaving then the actors and accessories to this proceeding, its origin and their motives, to the press and to which they themselves have exhibited it, he should join President Jackson in the confident belief expressed by him in the concluding paragraph of that part of his message which relates to the issuance of the Treasury order, "That his country would find, in the MOTIVES which had induced it, and in the HAPPY consequences which have ensued, much to commend, and nothing to condemn."

Mr. BENTON said, he had stated in the commencement of his speech that two great objects were to be accomplished by this rescinding resolution; first, the condemnation of President Jackson for a violation of the laws and constitution; and the destruction of the public prosperity; and, secondly, the overthrow of the constitutional currency, and the imposition of the paper money of all the State Governments upon the Federal Government. He had spoken to the first of these objects, and, as he hoped, successfully vindicated the President from all the charges on which it rested; the second object was now to be attended to, and would be discussed with all the brevity and despatch which the magnitude of the subject permitted.

This design (said Mr. B.) to overthrow the hard money system of the constitution, and to exstirpate the paper money system in its place, is as old as the constitution itself; and has been the leading policy of a great political party, from the foundation of that party, near fifty years ago, and under all its mutations of name, down to the present hour. Gold and silver, though not without a struggle for a national bank and a national paper currency, were made the currency of the Federal Government by the convention which created this Government. So fixed and jealous was the mind of the convention on this point, that even the power of coining gold and silver, which had been left to the States, under the articles of the confederation, was taken away from them by the new constitution. The members of that great convention were not only fixed upon having gold and silver for the currency of the new Government, but also determined upon its uniformity, so that the same piece should be the same thing, in form, name, device, and value, throughout the Union. The exclusion of paper money was as carefully enforced by the constitution as the adoption of gold and silver was sedulously guarded. The words of the constitution and the history of the times, and especially the 44th No. of the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison, all prove this. The early legislation of Congress conformed to the words and spirit of the constitution, and adopted the plainest and strongest language to guard the currency which it had adopted. The two acts, fundamental for the collection of the two great branches of the revenue—lands and customs: that of 1789 for the latter, and 1800 for the former, were express that gold and silver coin only should be received for the customs, and specie and evidences of the public debt only, for the public lands. These two great acts, being faithful interpreters of the constitution, have never been openly attacked in either House of Congress. In all the changes which subsequent legislation has made in the laws, of which the hard money enactments are part, these clauses have been retained in the same, or equivalent expressions; so that a hard money currency still remains the constitutional and the statutory currency of the Federal Government. Temporary enactments in favor of Treasury notes, and United States Bank notes, have ceased; and the joint resolution of 1816 neither does, nor can, repeal a law. Resolutions, whether joint or several, are not the mode of national legislation. They are only declaratory of facts or principles, or expressive of the opinions and purposes of the House or Houses, from which they emanate. The joint resolution differs from the single nothing but in being the declaration, the opinion, or the purpose of both Houses, instead of one. This being the case, and the two fundamental enactments of 1789 and 1800 being still in force, as retained in subsequent alterations of the laws to which they belong, the question is, how comes it that they have been treated as dead letters on the statute book, and paper money received in place of the hard money which they imperatively require? The answer to this question (said Mr. B.) carries us up to the time of General Hamilton, to the first year of his administration of the Treasury Department, and to the foundation of the political school of which he was the head. As Secretary of the Treasury, it became his duty to carry into effect the act of 1789, for the collection of the custom-house duties in gold and silver coin only. Instead of carrying the law into effect, he nullified it by construction. He interpreted "gold and silver coin only," to be the notes of specie-paying banks; and a deposit of bank notes, as cash, to be a deposit of specie. This was his construction, and the order which he issued to the collectors of the revenue corresponded with it. At the ensuing session of Congress he justified this construction in an argumentative report; and a few extracts from this report will show how the plain meaning of a law can be turned upside down by construction, and will reveal the source of the first imposition of paper money upon the Federal Government, and the reasons for that imposition.

"This section [30th of the revenue act of 1789] provides for the receipt of the duties in gold and silver coin only. The Secretary has considered this provision as having for its object the exclusion of payments in the paper emissions of the particular States, and the securing the immediate or ultimate collection of the duties in specie, as intended to prohibit to individuals the right of paying in any thing except gold or silver coin; but not to hinder the Treasury from making such arrangements as its exigencies, the speedy command of the public resources, and the convenience of the community, might dictate; these arrangements being compatible with the eventual receipt of the duties in specie. Such were the reflections of the Secretary with regard to the authority to permit bank notes to be taken in payment of the duties. The expediency of doing it appeared to him to be still less questionable. The ex-tion of their circulation by the measure, is calculated to increase both the ability and inclination of the banks to aid the Government. Banknotes being a convenient species of money, whatever increases their circulation increases the quantity of current money. But, convinced as the Secretary is of the usefulness of the regulation, yet, considering the nature of the clause upon which these remarks arise, he thought it his duty to bring the subject under the eye of the House. The measure is understood by all concerned, to be temporary. Indeed, whenever a national bank shall be instituted, some new disposition of the thing will be a matter of course."

Such was the argument, and such the object for departing from the act of 1789, and from the constitution, of which it was the faithful expositor. The effect was the gradual and general diffusion of a paper currency over the country, and a corresponding general and gradual disappearance and banishment of gold and silver; so that when the first national bank charter expired, in 1811, the Federal Government was left without a national currency, having neither United States Bank notes nor gold, and but little silver in the country. Mr. Madison's administration was then driven to the deplorable necessity of using State bank paper for a national currency; and the result is too well known in the ten years' convulsions of the paper system which ensued. The effect of the whole was the speedy resort to another national bank. This bank came to its conclusion under the administration of President Jackson; and he, avoiding the error into which President Madison's administration had fallen in 1811, resolved to re-establish the constitutional currency, and especially to revive the circulation of gold, which had ceased for more than twenty years. The success of this great plan was truly flattering. The gold currency, in three years, had risen from nothing to about fifteen millions of dollars; and the silver currency had increased in the same brief space from less than thirty millions to about sixty millions, and both against the determined opposition of a powerful political and moneyed party. The success of the experiment was established; and it was clear that the party opposed to gold and silver could no longer effect any thing by direct opposition. A new mode of making head against it was then fallen upon; and that new mode was to expand the paper system until it burst, and thus to ruin the party in power by ruining the finances and the currency. The general receivability of local paper for public lands, made it easy to inundate the Treasury, through the land offices, with local bank paper; and the spirit of speculation co-operating with this political design, turned an immense flood of paper upon the national domain. It was easy to see that this mass of paper, though credited to the Government on the books of the deposit banks as specie, was not cash, but only promises to pay cash; and that, in fact, it was destined to become a new and second accumulation of unavailable funds. A crisis in the federal finances was evidently approaching; and there was every reason to believe—the floors of the two Houses of Congress daily attested the fact—that swarms of speculators, loaded with paper money, were to alight upon the public lands immediately after the rise of Congress. It was probable that many tens of millions of paper would thus have been converted into land, and that the banks which issued it, being unable to redeem it, and the deposit banks which had improvidently credited it as cash, being unable to cash it, the whole would have sunk upon the hands of the Federal Government. The evil of such a state of things is too obvious to be depicted. Not only the Federal Government would have lost its land, and lost its revenues, but the whole community would have suffered. But here the energy and foresight of President Jackson was again victorious over the designs of enemies and the imprudence of friends. He determined to arrest the floods of paper which were ready to inundate the Treasury. The specie order was issued, and the country was saved. The wrath which the miscarriage of so many fine schemes occasioned, burst forth upon the President's head; the speculator for the loss of his myriad of acres; the politician for the escape of the Government from the danger that menaced it; the local banks for the loss of the national domain to bank upon; and the Bank of the United States for the loss of its anticipated opportunity of proving that a national bank was indispensable to the safe collection of the federal revenues. To make distress in the country, and charge it upon the Treasury order, was now the resort of all the disappointed parties. The Kentucky speech, and the Philadelphia letter, were the signal guns for a new panic; and the old drama of 1833 was immediately put in rehearsal for performance on the Washington boards as soon as Congress met. In every respect this second panic was a servile copy of the former; the same plot, the same scenes, the same incidents, the same performers. No fertility of invention characterized any part of it; no touch of genius enlivened the dull copy with the novelty even of a single new conception, or new phrase. Here we have it now, more like a starved wolf at the door, than a roaring lion; and lending its feeble aid to the cause of this rescinding resolution. That resolution is to open the doors of the Treasury again to the inundation of paper money, that the catastrophe averted last summer, may be produced next spring; and the question now is, shall Congress give up the public lands to spoil, and the public Treasury to unconvertible paper, after President Jackson has saved the country from both evils? This is the point we are now at; and if any one wishes proof of the design to overthrow the constitutional currency and to impose paper money upon the Government, let him look at the universality of the abuse now lavished upon gold and silver, and the applause bestowed upon paper money by all that great party now palpably discriminated by the distinctive features of the transition school. Here is a specimen, taken from the Philadelphia letter, the force and beauty of which will be fully comprehended by the bottom of the Mississippi river.

"But this miserable folly about an exclusive metallic currency is quite as absurd as to discard the steamboats, and go back to pulling up the Mississippi."

This is the manner in which this great party speak of the currency of the constitution. "Miserable folly,"—as much behind paper money as a keel is behind a steamboat. But why lose time to prove their hatred of gold, and their adoration of paper? They would be ashamed to have it thought otherwise. They take care that nobody shall think otherwise by their ostentatious abuse, in season and out of season, of the gold currency; and by their ostentatious praise, without rhyme or reason, of paper money. It is incontestable, then, that the imposition of the paper system upon the Federal Government, is the second great object of this resolution; and that for the avowed reasons mentioned by Gen. Hamilton in his argument of 1790, in favor of substituting paper for gold and silver.

Mr. B. envied not the vocation of any man, or of any party, who employed themselves in the habitual vituperation of any part of the constitution of the country; and especially that part of it which was considered by its framers as among the most important and valuable. Gold and silver is the currency of the constitution. Those who attack that currency, attack the constitution, and that in one of its most valuable parts, and the very part which most universally concerns the people. Every citizen is concerned in the currency; and to attack that money which the constitution guarantees, is to attack at once, his rights and the sacred instrument by which he holds it. Mr. B. had shown the origin of this war of paper against gold; he had shown it to lie at the origin of the great political parties which, under whatsoever names, have existed for near fifty years in this country; and it was perfectly clear that, from the time of General Hamilton to the present day, a preference of paper to gold and silver has been the distinctive tenet of one party, and constitutes the essential and radical distinction between the two.

Mr. B. said, it was incontestable that every nation must have a national currency. It must have such a currency not only in name, but in fact; and nothing can answer for a national currency but that which combines two properties; first, uniformity of value all over the country; secondly, convenient portability. Silver possesses one of these qualities, but it lacks the other; gold possesses both; and the constitution of the United States guarantees its use. Gold is then the constitutional national currency of the United States; and Mr. B. held all attempts to substitute paper in its place to be unconstitutional, and pernicious. Two national banks had been chartered to furnish a national paper currency; they have both been put down, after twenty years trial of each, by the power of the people. When the first was put down, a fatal error was committed by those who did it in not restoring gold; and that error was doubled by falling back upon local State paper, and adopting it for the currency of the Federal Government. Profiting by that great error, those who put down the second national bank, made it a part of their plan, and the part upon the success of which every thing was to depend, that gold, and not local bank paper, should become the national currency of the Union. This was the plan; and in pursuance of it, many steps have been taken towards excluding local bank paper from the receipts and expenditures of the Federal Government, and introducing gold in its place. The largest and most essential of these steps was the Treasury order of July last; and now, the present movement for the rescission of that order, and for the continuation of local paper in the receipts, and consequently in the expenditures, of the Federal Government, brings up the question, whether gold, or local paper, is to be made the national currency. It brings up the question; for, what the Government receives as cash, it must pay out as cash; and, what the Government thus receives and pays out, becomes the currency of the country also; for people single-handed cannot make head against the action of the Government. The effect of the present movement, then, is, to overturn the plan of those who put down the Bank of the United States; and to substitute for the national gold currency, which they promised the country, the actual paper currencies of all the States and Territories of the Union. This is the effect of the movement; and the question now is, will the Senate put down gold? for gold can never live in such company, and adopt all these currencies? Passing by the constitutional objection, as too obvious to need enforcement, and too often invoked without effect, Mr. B. would endeavor to address himself practically to the sense of the Senate, by showing them the mass of the evil which it was proposed to assume. Here it is, said he, (holding up a copy of Bicknell's Counterfeit Detector.) Here it is; a little volume of 32 pages, the first six containing twelve columns of the names of banks, alphabetically arranged by States and Territories, (Missouri and Arkansas the only names not in the list,) and each column containing about eighty names. The remaining twenty-six pages are filled with the description of the illegitimate progeny of these banks; that is to say, with a frightful and sickening exhibition of forgeries. Here then is near one thousand banks—probably upwards of a thousand by this time—whose promissory notes are to be put on an equal footing with gold and silver at the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices of the United States; and which, being on an equal footing, will soon have the upper hand, and have all the custom-houses, land offices, and post offices to themselves; for gold and silver will never go where they go, and will never abide where they sojourn.

We are called upon (said Mr. B.) to adopt this wilderness of banks as furnishers of currency to the Federal Government; to accept their paper promises to pay gold and silver, in lieu of gold and silver; and thus to make them the coiners, not of money, but of paper for the Federal Government; and to enable them to supersede the constitutional coinage of the United States. He did not enter into the question how far the States, each for itself, might authorize paper currency; that is not the question now, but whether the Federal Government shall adopt as its own, all the paper currencies of all the States and Territories? This is what we are called upon to do; and by whom? Certainly there may be some very disinterested and very patriotic men so calling; but, more certainly, there are four deeply interested classes so calling, and visibly seen at the head of the movement. These classes were, 1. The speculators, who want bank loans and bank facilities to enable them to out-bid the settlers, and to monopolize the choicest lands; 2. The local banks, who want the national domain as a capital to bank upon, and to give credit and circulation to their notes in all the new States; 3. Politicians out of power, who foresee, in the reception of this local paper, the ruin of the finances; and in that ruin, foresee, also, the downfall of those now in power, and the elevation of themselves; 4. The Bank of the United States, which foresees likewise, in the same ruin, its own resuscitation; and which, pending that event, has gone into abeyance under a State charter, to be ready for the occasion. These were the classes whose clamors against the Treasury order had stunned the public ear; these were the classes who denounced the President; these the classes who demand the instant rescission of that order. As one of those who had contributed to put down the Bank of the United States, and who had promised a restoration of the gold currency, Mr. B. must be permitted to make head against this movement, which goes to re-establish that bank, and to suppress that golden currency.

Having stated the number of the banks in the United States, he would say a word as to their reputed capitals and circulation. The chartered capital was computed at near one thousand millions of dollars; the paid up capital was stated at three hundred and twenty five millions; the chartered right to issue paper money, exceeded one thousand millions; and the actual circulation was computed at one hundred and thirty millions. Now all the specie in the country is computed at seventy-five millions; so that the reputed paid-up capital is four times greater than all the specie in the country, and seven times greater than all the specie the banks possess. Mr. B. did not pretend that the banks should always have all their capital in their hands; but he did insist that it must be in the country! so that, when needed, it could be had. The reputed paid-up capital is not in the country, by a difference of four to one; so that the fact stands revealed that a great proportion of these banks are banking on stock notes, and on each other's notes; and the stockholders not being liable, the foundations of a great number of these banks must be unsolid and delusive; entirely unsafe for the community to rely upon; and that it would be a cruel thing for the Federal Government, by increasing their credit, to extend the sphere of their circulation, and to enlarge the vortex of their mischief when the day comes to which all unsolid banks are daily liable.

Mr. B. said that we had borrowed the paper system from England, and from the Adam Smith school, whose work on political economy had appeared about the close of the American revolution, and created that passion for banking which has since prevailed in Great Britain and our America. He would show that the English representatives of that school are now convinced of their error, and are endeavoring to extirpate the country from a bank of issue except that of the Bank of England, for the solvency of which the Government of Great Britain stands security to the whole amount of its capital. Repeating that we had borrowed the paper system from Great Britain, Mr. B. had two remarks to make upon it; first, that banking with us was on a far more unsafe footing than in Great Britain; secondly, that banks of issue were found to be too unsafe to be longer tolerated there. He proceeded to show the foundations on which he made these assertions; and afterwards to make a practical application of his remarks to the question before the Senate.

First, that banking in the United States was on a more unsafe footing than in Great Britain. There was a fundamental difference (he said) between classes of banks. In Great Britain there were two classes; one of discount, deposit, and exchange; another, of circulation. This latter class was the only one existing in the United States, and it was from it that ALL the public evils of banking flowed. Here, then, was a radical difference between the systems of banking in the two countries; the British system having the two species of banks, and the American system having but one, and that the dangerous one. Confining his remarks, then, to the class common to the two countries, (banks of issue,) he would show that this class is on a far more unsafe footing in the United States than in Great Britain. The Bank of England (he said) was backed by the Government of Great Britain for its debts and capital. The notes of the institution were a legal tender to the Government; and in a Government whose annual taxes are two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, the legal receivability of notes to this amount is a fund for the redemption of more notes than the Bank of England ever had in circulation. Her highest issue, during the suspension of specie payments and issue of one and two-pound notes was twenty nine millions and a half pounds sterling, say $146,000,000. Her issues since the resumption of specie payments, and suppression of one and two-pound notes, has in a period of six years, anterior to 1832, ranged from 18 to 23,000,000 sterling, being about 100,000,000 of dollars. The taxes to the Government, then would absorb them, though at a loss to all holders who did not owe to the Government the amount of what they held. This was some security for the notes of the bank; but there was another, and a greater security, and this lay in the direct responsibility of the Government for the whole amount of the capital of the bank. The capital of that bank consisted of successive loans to the Government, commencing in 1694, in a loan of £1,200,000 sterling, and continued by additional loans, at different periods, until it amounts to £14,686,000, and bearing an interest all the time at 3 per cent. per annum. This is now the capital of the bank, and the debt of the Government to the bank, and the amount of the Government's direct security for the liabilities of the institution. No such Government security as this has existed, or can exist in our country; and even with it, the Bank of England has twice suspended specie payments, and once for twenty years; besides inflicting the ordinary evils of banking upon the Government and the country. Proceeding to what are called the country banks in England, Mr. B. showed that they were on a safer footing than the local banks of the United States. In the first place, the partners and stockholders were each liable in his person and property for the whole amount of the debts of the institution; and this liability continued in the case of joint stock partnerships until three years after a partner had ceased to belong to the institution, for every thing done while he was a member of it. In the next place, the English banks issue no note under £5, which is both a check upon their circulation and a diminution of the danger of losses to the community. In England, every note bore a government stamp, and paid a tax, which was also some restraint on issues. The mode of payment was another, as silver was only a tender to the amount of forty shillings; so that country bank notes could only be paid in gold, or Bank of England notes, and these latter could only be paid in gold; so that, directly or indirectly, gold was the fund of redemption for the whole English circulation, which was a far greater check upon bank issues than silver. In the last place, forgeries could be punished and restrained in England, and can hardly be punished or restrained in the United States. The extent of our country, and the independence of the States, and their judiciary, interpose effectual barriers against the punishment of forgeries in one State upon the paper of other and distant States. These differences, continued Mr. B., show that banking is on a less dangerous footing in Great Britain than in the United States; and now what is the result of experience there? It is fifty years since the Adam Smith school established their perfect idea of a paper system, and brought into general use those banks of issue on which they lavished all the holiday phrases still in vogue in the United States: "Well regulated specie paying banks—properly constructed specie paying banks—duly restricted specie paying banks—safe and solid specie paying banks." It is fifty years since these phrases ruled the legislation of Great Britain; and what is the lesson which 50 years' experience has taught? Mr. B. would not answer this question from the writings of the anti-paper school, nor even from the bullion school of England; he would answer it from the Adam Smith school itself; from the writings of Mr. McCulloch, Professor of Political Economy in the University of London, and the present head of the Adam Smith school, whose work he has recently edited with a volume of notes to show what has happened since the time of Dr. Smith, and what improvements the paper system required in England. Mr. B. read the title of one of his chapters, and some passages from the chapter itself. This is the title, or index, to the contents of the chapter:

"Quantity of Bank of England paper afloat at different periods—Effects produced on the country banks by a contraction of the issues of the Bank of England—Destruction of country bank paper in 1793—Crisis of 1797—Destruction of country bank paper in 1814, 1815, 1816; also in 1825 and 1826—Measures proposed in 1826 for improving the state of the currency—Remarks on those measures—Proposal for taking security from country banks—Advantages that would result from carrying this proposal into effect—Objections to it examined and answered."

Mr. B. then read some passages from the chapter itself, regretting the necessity which limited him to few and brief extracts:

1. Panic of 1793.—"The extended transactions of the country required fresh facilities for carrying them on; and, in consequence, a bank was erected in every market town, and in almost every village. To force their paper into circulation was the object of all. The catastrophe which followed was such as might have been foreseen. The currency having become redundant, the exchanges took an unfavorable turn in the early part of 1792; and the Bank of England having been, in consequence, obliged to narrow her issues, a most violent revulsion took place in the end of that year and beginning of 1793. The failure of one or two great houses excited a panic, which proved fatal to myriads more. When this revulsion began, there were, it is supposed, about 550 country banks in England and Wales, of which about 100 were compelled to stop payment, and upwards of 50 more were totally destroyed, producing by their fall an extent of misery and bankruptcy that had been, until then, unknown in England."

2. Panic of 1814.—"Up to 1813 there were banks in almost all parts of England; forcing their paper into circulation at an enormous expense to themselves. The price of corn had risen to an extraordinary height in 1813, and fell in the beginning of 1814. This fall produced a want of confidence, and an alarm among the country bankers and their customers; and such a destruction of country paper took place as has not been paralleled, except only by the revulsion in 1825. By 1816 no fewer than 240 country banks had stopped payments, and 92 commissions of bankruptcy were issued by these establishments. The failures that then occurred were the more distressing, as they chiefly affected the industrious and poorer classes, and frequently swallowed up, in an instant, the fruits of a long life of laborious exertion. Thousands upon thousands, who had considered themselves affluent, found they were destitute of all real property; and sunk, as if by enchantment, and without any fault of their own, into the abyss of poverty. The universality of the wretchedness and misery had never been equalled, perhaps, except by the breaking up of the Mississippi scheme in France."

3. Panic of 1825.—"Nations are slow and reluctant learners, and it seems as if additional experience had been necessary to convince the Parliament and people of England that there was anything defective in a system which had, in two previous instances, deluged the country with bankruptcy; and which enables every individual, however poor and unpunished, who chooses to open a money shop, to issue notes to serve as currency in the ordinary transactions of society! A rise of prices and a rage for speculation took place in 1824, '5. Many of the country bankers seemed to have no other object than to get themselves indebted to the public; and such was the vigor and success of their efforts to get their paper into circulation, that the amount of it afloat in 1825 was estimated to be near fifty per cent. greater than the amount of it afloat in 1823. The consequences of this extravagant and unprincipled conduct is well known. The currency became redundant—exchange began to decline, and a heavy drain for bullion compelled the Bank of England to lessen her issues. This was the signal for the repetition of the tragedy of 1793, but on a much larger and more magnificent scale, and with more destructive consequences. Sauve qui peut! Save himself who can! was the universal cry; and the destruction of country paper was so sudden and excessive, that in less than six weeks above seventy banking establishments were swept off."

This (said Mr. B.) is McCulloch's account of the three paper system earthquakes which have taken place since the time of Adam Smith, maugre all his fine phrases about specie-paying banks, and bank notes equivalent to gold, and convertible into gold at the will of the holder. Three times in twenty-five years has the whole blown up! to say nothing of the crisis of 1797, and the numerous small panics and individual explosions which have filled up the intervals between the large ones. The result is a conviction that banks of issue must be suppressed, directly or indirectly, all over England. The mode proposed, is to require security from them, in addition to their individual liability, and that not the personal security of men, but the real security of lands mortgaged, or government stock pledged. Here is an extract from McCulloch on this point:

"Whatever bank notes may be in law, they are practically, and in fact, a legal tender. The great mass of the people are totally without the power to refuse them. The currency of many extensive districts consists almost entirely of country notes; and such small farmers, tradesmen, or laborers, as should refuse to take them, would be obliged to migrate elsewhere. There cannot, therefore, as it appears to me, be the shadow of a doubt that this is a case in which Government is imperiously called upon to interfere. We have sustained incomparably more mischief from the issue of spurious paper than from that of base coin; and in order to obviate such mischief in future, and to give that security to the public which is so essential, we have, as was observed before, no alternative, but either to suppress country notes altogether, or to require security from the issuers."

"In the case of Bank of England notes, a guarantee is taken by the Government for the notes which the bank issues; and the whole capital of the bank must be lost before the holders of the notes can be sufferers. Why is not the same principle followed with respect to country banks? What objection can there be against requiring of those who take upon themselves the office of furnishing the country with a circulating medium, to deposit with Government, an adequate security for the performance of their engagements? In the use of money every one is a trader; those whose habits and pursuits are little suited to explore the mechanism of trade, are obliged to make use of money, and are no way qualified to ascertain the solidity of the different banks whose paper is in circulation; accordingly we find that men living on limited incomes, women, laborers, and mechanics of all descriptions, are often severe sufferers by the failure of country banks, which have lately become frequent beyond all example. Against this mischief the public should be protected by requiring of every country bank (that is to say every bank except the Bank of England, for which the Government is security to the whole amount of its capital) to deposit with Government, or with Commissioners appointed for that purpose, funded property, or other Government security, in some proportion to the amount of their issues. No establishment for the issue of notes could then exist, unless it had been set on foot by individuals possessed of adequate capital. And adventurers, speculating on the funds of others, and sharps, anxious to get themselves indebted to the public, would find that banking was no longer a field on which they could advantageously enter."

Mr. B. would economise time and words, and proceed to the practical application of these extracts from the present head of the paper system school in England. It is a surrender and proposed suppression of all banks of issue except the Bank of England, for which the British Government is the security and the responsible backer. This is what the original of our paper system, and a far safer system than ours, has come to in England! Given up, and proscribed by the school that founded it, and that school more seriously engaged now in putting down their system than they were fifty years ago in founding it! And what is the state of things with us? Not only an appalling extension of the paper system through the annual bank incorporations of nearly thirty Legislatures, State and territorial, but this attempt now made in the Senate of the United States to compel the adoption of all the State and Territorial paper systems, existing or to exist, by the Federal Government; and thus to make out of this multifarious mass, a national paper currency. This is the effect; and, without disturbing the States in the use of this paper themselves, Mr. B. confined himself to the question before the Senate, namely, the adoption of the whole of it for the currency of the Federal Government. To this he had insuperable and inexorable objections, founded, first, upon the constitution of the United States; and, next, upon the unspeakable mischiefs of the scheme. On the constitutional point he would be brief, limiting himself to the words of the instrument, and to Mr. Madison's Commentary.

The constitution says:

Congress shall have power:

"To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

"To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States."

"No State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts."

Mr. Madison, in No. 44 of the Federalist, says:

"The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilential effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather an accumulation of guilt, which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin, prove, with equal force, that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts is withdrawn from the States, on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

Resting the constitutional objection to this adoption of the State paper currencies for the currency of the Federal Government where the constitution and Mr. Madison had put it, and merely referring to the great revenue acts of 1789 and 1800, for the correct exposition of the constitution, in limiting the receipts for the customs and the lands to "gold and silver coin only," and "to specie or evidences of the public debt," Mr. B. would state the heads, and the heads only, of the objections to the expediency of the measure. Premising that what the Government received, as cash, would have to be paid out as cash, and that if local paper was received at all, it would soon be received totally and to the exclusion of specie, and that local paper would thus become the actual currency of the Government and the country, until relieved from it by a general explosion, Mr. B. went on to enumerate the practical evils of such an unconstitutional currency.

1. The destruction of the standard, or measure of value. Paper money, neither is, ever was, or ever can be, a standard of value. Its quantity varies at the will of man, or rather at the will of each of the thousand Neptunes who preside over the ocean of paper; and not only at their will, but without their will, in the mere imprudence or folly of those who direct paper issues, and the thousand causes which operate upon the expansion and contraction of banks. The standard, or measure of value, is at this moment materially altered in the United States. This is seen in the increased price of every article which depends for its price upon the domestic market; and it is proved by the stationary or reduced price of every article which depended for its price on foreign markets. Cotton and tobacco were in this latter class, and had not risen, but rather fallen; all articles of home use and consumption were in the former, and all had risen, some one half, some double. The precious metals, from their uniformity of production, difficulty of suddenly and violently changing the quantity and intrinsic value all over the world, can alone make a standard or measure of value. Our constitution has guaranteed that standard to us; and it is our sacred duty to preserve it. Mr. B. finished his remarks on this point with a quotation from Mr. McCulloch, preferring his authority to others because he was of the paper system school, though now limiting his system to the Bank of England only:

"No doubt, has ever been insinuated with respect to the expediency of the regulations by which all weights and measures of the same denomination are rendered equal. But money is not a commodity merely; it is also the STANDARD or MEASURE, adopted by the society by which to estimate and compare the value of every thing else that is bought and sold; and if it be, as it most undoubtedly is, the duty of Government to adopt every practicable means for remedying all foot-rots of the same length, and all bushels of the same capacity, it must be still more incumbent upon it to omit nothing to render money, or the MEASURE OF VALUE, a measure which is beyond all question the most important of any used in society, uniform or steady in its value."

2. Usury. This, he said, was a direct effect of paper money. The more banks of issue, the higher the rate of interest. Common bank interest in the United States is seven per cent. or more, which is double the rate of interest in Holland, where there is no paper. But common interest is nothing compared to the usury which ensues great banking, and which becomes enormous when banks, from necessity or mischief, stop discounts and throw borrowers upon money dealers. Three per cent discount per month is then the order of things; and this may now be seen in Philadelphia, where the United States Bank, with its thirty-five millions capital, on becoming a State institution, was to fill the State with money and reduce interest to five per cent. But that bank does lend to some borrowers at five per cent. or less. The correspondence of the commissioners employed in examining the state of the bank, preparatory to the settlement of the value of the United States stock, shows a mass of loans to the amount of 20,337,136 00 of dollars, on extended or indefinite time, and at rates from 4½, 5, 5½, to 6 per cent. per annum. No doubt many of the three per cent. per month borrowers get their supplies from a part of those loans.

3. Panics, convulsions, and stoppages. These (said Mr. B.) are inherent in the paper system. They take place in England in defiance of all power in the Government and the banks themselves to keep them down. There, no panics are perpetrated to scourge the country, or to overset the Government, save and except the two political ones lately seen, Mr. O'Connor's, and the one during the interregnum of Lord Grey's administration. But here, panics are the regular work of banks and politicians, and are now looked for whenever an important election is depending, or Congress is to be excited.

4. The expenses of the paper system. This was probably greater at present than the expenses of the Federal Government, and the whole a tax upon the productive classes. The number of banks was about one thousand; each bank had its officers, and they their salaries; each had its stockholders, and they their profits. Then came losses for broken banks, counterfeits and depreciated paper; and changes in the value of property from expansions and contractions of the currency. These expenses and losses were the price paid by the people for a paper currency; when they can get constitutional currency from the mints, without paying salaries, furnishing profits, or sustaining losses, if paper was checked and confined to large notes.

5. Stock gambling, forgeries, banishment of all gold and silver, were all great evils inherent in the paper system, and too obvious to need, or even to endure, commentary. Mr. B. therefore, barely named them, and left every one's knowledge and memory to do the rest.

Mr. B. approached the conclusion of his remarks on this great subject. It was indeed a great subject, involving that momentous question, the national currency. The Treasury order was a measure of regulation upon the State banks, intended to save the finances, and the currency, as well as the public lands. The Bank of the United States regulated the State banks by the simple process of excluding their paper from the federal receipts and expenditures; and this was effected by the 24th and 25th articles of the by-laws of the corporation already read. She excluded them to make room for her own notes; and this was the extent of her skill, and of her merit, in all this boasted regulation of local currencies of which we hear so much. The Federal Government has only to do the same, and the State bank issues are repelled upon their sources, and become comparatively harmless. It is receivability for federal dues; it is receivability at the land offices, custom-houses, and post offices, which gives them wings to fly over the continent, and enables them to pass without regard to the credit or solvency of the bank from which they come. It is the Federal Government endorsement which does the mischief; and this endorsement, for all the purposes of false credit, and want of responsibility, is given to the whole issue of every bank whose paper is made receivable for public dues. The experiment has been tried, and local paper has failed as a national currency, and out of that failure arose the second United States Bank. It will fail again! and again! and forever! There is no safety for the federal revenues, but in the total exclusion of local paper, and that from every branch of the revenue—customs, lands, and post office. There is no safety for the national finances, but in the constitutional medium of gold and silver. After forty years of wandering in the wilderness of paper money, we have approached the confines of the constitutional medium. Seventy-five millions of specie in the country, with the prospect of annual increase of ten or twelve millions for the next four years, three branch mints to commence next spring, and the complete restoration of the gold currency, announce the success of President Jackson's great measures for the reform of the currency, and vindicate the Constitution from the libel of having prescribed an impracticable currency. The success is complete; and there is no way to thwart it, but to put down the Treasury order, and to reopen the public lands to the inundation of paper money. Of this, it is not to be dissembled, there is great danger. Four deeply interested classes are at work to do it; speculators, local banks, United States Bank, and politicians out of power. They may succeed, but he, Mr. B. would not despair. The darkest hour of the night is just before the break of day; and, through the gloom ahead, he saw the bright vision of the constitutional currency, erect, radiant, and victorious. Through regulation, or explosion, success must eventually come. If reform measures go on, gold and silver will be gradually and temperately restored; if reform measures are stopped, then the paper system runs riot, and explodes from its own expansion. Then the Bank of the United States will exult in the catastrophe, and claim its own re-establishment, as the only adequate regulator of the local banks. Then it will be said the specie experiment has failed. But no. The contrary will be known; that the specie experiment has not failed, but it was put down by the voice and power of the interested classes, and must be put up again by the voice and power of the disinterested community.

APPENDIX TO MR. BENTON'S SPEECH.

I. That the banks themselves, by contractions and expansions of the currency, lead to fluctuations which affect the prices of produce and property, and beget panics.

1. Extract from the testimony of Joseph C. Dyer, Esq. Director of the Bank of Manchester, taken before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The Bank of England, the cause of fluctuations and panics."—"The bank has been the cause of the panics. Their manner of issuing and withdrawing the Bank of England paper, produces those continued fluctuations, at short periods, which affect the prices in the market, and thereby affect trade. Those issues, sometimes in a single week, vary three or four millions. The bank may be necessitated to do so, but such a necessity is that of inflicting a great evil on the country. The returns of the weekly issues from the 23rd of December, 1819 to February 4th, 1826, prove witness's statement.

"The reason why it is necessary to make an alteration in the banking system of Lancashire, is, that the circulation by the Bank of England subjects the trade to fluctuations, and exercises a pernicious influence over the destinies of commerce. This expansion and contraction of the circulation induce similar effects to a ruinous extent. All the periods of panic may be attributed to that power exercised in secret, and of which the public can have no knowledge, until it has accomplished its results. It stimulates over-issues in the country, raises and lowers the value of money capriciously, and erects its own security on the insecurity of country bankers. Such a company, possessing such influence so exercised, is a dangerous company; and plans can be devised to procure a better circulation than the present, in which there is neither stability nor steadiness."

2. Extract from the preface to the digest of evidence taken before Lord Althorpe's committee in 1832:

"The records of past history have invariably designated a time of peace as one of prosperity and happiness. But ever since the last war, the different great interests of this country have been in a continued state of fluctuation between the extremes of prosperity and adversity; though the latter has unfortunately predominated. In the beginning of that year, (1825) every class of the community was doing well, if not in a state of great prosperity. But a change took place in the currency, by the Bank of England contracting their issues. The general prosperity, without any other visible cause, immediately received a check; and as the bank continued to contract their issues, matters became worse, until they ended in the panic. By this a total derangement of the monetary system was occasioned, and every class of the community was thrown into a state of embarrassment; the injurious and depressing effects of which continued for some years, and this without any other apparent cause than the monetary derangement which had occurred."

"An undue issue of four or five millions by the Bank (of England), would eventually make an extraordinary derangement in the value of all the property in the kingdom, and be productive of infinite mischief in a variety of ways."

3. Further extract from the testimony of J. C. Dyer, Esq.

"I think the banks, so far from having saved the country from the effects of those panics, have been the cause of those panics; and that they have been the cause of a constant succession of little panics, continually annoying the commerce of the country, by monthly and weekly fluctuations."

4. Extract from the testimony of Benjamin J. Smith, Esq. a director of the Bank of Manchester, before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The supply of the circulation by the Bank of England subjects our trade to great and injurious fluctuations, owing to what is called a scarcity of money, arising from causes of which the public, who are deeply interested in that question, can have no knowledge. The objections to the existing system are, that the Bank of England has a secret and despotic influence and control over the destinies of our commerce, which we feel to be a most pernicious one."

II. No local banks of issue in the great county of Lancashire, including Liverpool and Manchester. Inland bills of exchange used in large dealings; gold in the common transactions.

1. Extract from the evidence of J. C. Dyer, Esq. a director of the Bank of Manchester, before Lord Althorpe's committee:

"The bankers in Manchester who can, do not, issue notes in consequence of the strong feeling that prevails in Lancashire against local paper. There were two occasions when that feeling was publicly expressed; first, in 1834, and next when the Bank of Manchester was formed. Bankers who intended to issue notes abandoned their intention, from a conviction that they could not, under any such circumstances, derive any profit from the issue."

2. Extract from Mr. McCulloch's Notes on Adam Smith's work:

"The principal distinction between notes and bills of exchange is, that every individual passing a bill of exchange has to endorse it, and by so doing makes himself responsible for its contents. Nothing can be more inaccurate than to represent bank notes and bills of exchange under the same point of view. The note is payable on the instant, with-out deduction—the bill not until some future period. The note may be passed to another, without incurring any risk or responsibility, while every endorser of the bill makes himself liable for the value of it. Bank notes form the currency of all classes, of those who are not engaged in business, of women, children, laborers, &c. who are all, as we have seen, without the power to refuse them, and without the means of forming any correct conclusion as to the solvency of the issuers. Bills of exchange, on the other hand, pass only, with very few exceptions, between persons engaged in business, and who are fully aware of the risk they run in taking them."

3. Further extract from McCulloch's notes:

"The effect produced by the employment of internal bills of exchange, have not certainly excited that attention on the part of most of those who have speculated on the subject of currency, that might reasonably have been expected; but this seems to have arisen chiefly from their having been but very imperfectly aware of the vast magnitude of the transactions settled by their intervention, and of the extent to which they are employed. In the great manufacturing country of Lancashire, and in part of Yorkshire, a bill on London of three months is reckoned a money payment; and by far the largest proportion of the currency consists either of the bills of bankers drawn on their correspondents, or of those of the merchants and dealers scattered up and down the country. The following extracts from the evidence given before the committee of the House of Lords on Scotch and Irish currency, in the session of 1836, show the great extent to which internal bills are now employed. Mr. Gladstone, an eminent merchant of Liverpool, informed the committee that, 'We sell our goods, not for payments in cash, such as are usual in other places, but generally at credits from ten days to three months date; these bills we pay to our bankers, and receive from them bills or cash. We have a considerable portion of large Bank of England notes in circulation; these are generally used for the payment of duties, and also for the purpose of remittance; but the great mass of our circulation is in bills of exchange. Sovereigns and smaller bank notes are only required for such objects as charges of merchandise, with duties, freights, and other items.' Lewis Lloyd, Esq. 'The wages of workmen are paid in gold or Bank of England notes; the manufacturer is chiefly paid in bills of exchange. When a bill is drawn in favor of a manufacturer, he endorses it to the person to whom he pays it, and the person to whom he pays it pays it again to another; and it goes on often till it is covered with endorsements. Mr. Henry Burgess, a manufacturer at Leeds: 'The great mass of the circulating medium of Lancashire, as in all the manufacturing districts in the north, is bills of exchange; a part of the circulation is in gold and silver, and Bank of England notes.'

III. Suppression of all banks of issue in England, except the Bank of England, directly by law, or indirectly, by compelling them to give security for their issues.

1. Extract from Mr. Culloch's notes on Adam Smith:

"It seems, therefore, to be indispensable, either that the country banks should be compelled, as has been previously proposed, to give full security for their issues, or that their paper should be suppressed altogether, and the paper of the Bank of England, substituted in its place. Now, it is obvious, and is indeed universally admitted, that the only measure that can be adopted for guarding completely against the misconduct, as well as the bad faith of the country bankers, is to compel them to give full security for the payment of their notes. This, and this alone, can afford a sufficient guarantee to the public that the country paper in circulation will be returned when presented for payment, and that it is really equivalent to gold."

"Every country banker, on applying for stamps, should be required, and obliged, previously to obtaining them, to lodge in the hands of Government, securities in stocks or in landed estates, fully equivalent to the amount of the stamps issued to him."

2. Extract from the testimony of Henry Burgess, Esq. Secretary of the Committee of Country Banks, representing seven-eighths of the bankers in England, who have resolved to relinquish their circulation, rather than give security for it:

"The only strong opinion to which the committee have come, is, that of securing their issues were demanded, they would relinquish their issues altogether. That resolution was embodied in a petition to Parliament. The chief reason why country bankers would cease to issue notes, if called upon for securities, is, that it would be giving a preference to one class of creditors over another; besides, giving securities would be locking up their money in the funds, which money would thus be unavailable, and be also placed at risk. So they would prefer to give up their circulation."

IV. Extract from the report of the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to examine into the debts and affairs of the Bank of the United States, to ascertain the value of the stock, showing above twenty millions of loans at low interest for long terms, or indefinite terms, and explaining the reason why borrowers in Philadelphia are thrown upon brokers at two and three per cent. discount per month.

REMARKS OF MR. RIVES, OF VIRGINIA.

In Senate, Wednesday, Dec. 21, 1836—On the reference of Mr. Calhoun's bill for continuing the provisions of the Deposit bill.

Mr. RIVES said he was in favor of referring the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) to the Committee on Finance; and as the honorable gentleman seemed to think there would be a want of courtesy in giving it that direction, he would state briefly why it seemed to him that, on the very principles on which the Senator from South Carolina placed his proposition, it ought to go to that committee, and to none other. The proposition itself assumed that there would be a surplus during the coming year, in making provision for its deposit with the States. The first inquiry, therefore, was: is there likely to be such a surplus under the existing rates of duties, combined with the land sales? The Senator from South Carolina had entered into calculations, to show that there would be a surplus of some eight or ten millions the next year. But this was matter for a difference of opinion. The Secretary of the Treasury thought otherwise. The Committee on Finance, being specially charged with the estimates of the public revenue and expenditure, was the proper tribunal to take cognizance of this question, and report its opinion on the subject to the Senate. But, again. The gentleman from South Carolina had distinctly said, that if a surplus can be prevented by altering the existing rates of duties, without serious injury to any of the great interests of the country, he would prefer such a reduction of the revenue to any measure for a farther deposit with the States. But whether, and in what mode, such a reduction can be effected, is precisely a question for the Committee on Finance. The gentleman's proposition, therefore, depending, in his own view of it, on that question, ought clearly to take the same destination.

For my own part, said Mr. R. I do not hesitate to say, that if there be any danger of another surplus accruing during the coming year, timely and effectual measures should be taken to prevent it by an adequate reduction of the revenue. He had given his hearty support to the deposit bill of the last session. He considered it, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a wise, useful, and necessary measure, and every day's observation and reflection since had convinced him more and more of its importance and happy consequences. He was sure he should never regret the vote he had given on that occasion. But our situation now is essentially different. Then, a large surplus had already accumulated on our hands, and the problem was, not how to prevent, but how to dispose of it in the manner least pernicious and hazardous to the country. But now we are at the beginning of a new session of Congress, and with the lights derived from the past, may look ahead, and form some reasonable estimate of the financial prospects of the year. If we can foresee a surplus beyond the just and constitutional wants of the Government as at all probable, we are bound, on every principle of legislative duty, to anticipate and prevent it by suitable measures of reduction. The first duty of the representatives of the people is to relieve them from unnecessary taxation, and to adjust the public income to a prudent and economical expenditure.

There was one other observation of the Senator from South Carolina, which he begged leave to notice. The honorable gentleman said if a majority of the Senate should determine to refer his proposition to the Committee on Finance, he would undertake to be a prophet, and pronounce that the policy of that majority, and the result of the action of the committee, would be nothing but a deceitful demonstration upon the subject of a reduction of duties. [Mr. CALHOUN shook his head at the word deceitful.] Mr. R. did not profess to give the precise words of the gentleman. He spoke, at all events, of the policy of the administration and its friends terminating in a mere demonstration on this subject; and that all that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury had said in regard to it would turn out to be a delusive feint, if his proposition should be committed to the Committee of Finance. [Mr. C. assented.] How did the honorable gentleman arrive at this conclusion? Was it not on his motion, earnestly persisted in, no longer ago than yesterday, that so much of the President's message as related to the reduction of duties was referred to this very committee? The honorable gentleman seemed then perfectly satisfied with the Finance Committee; and was even profuse in his well-bestowed compliments on the distinguished gentlemen who composed it. Did he mean nothing more than a demonstration? Had he not been in earnest? He hoped the gentleman had no such policy, nor could he suppose him to have been influenced by any such motive.

[Mr. CALHOUN, in some subsequent remarks, said he opposed the reference of his bill to the Finance Committee as contrary to parliamentary rule, because a majority of that committee were known to be adverse to its object. He also said he would not be the man to disturb the compromise of 1833, unless it could be done by general consent.]

Mr. RIVES briefly rejoined: As the Senator from South Carolina was only conditionally in favor of the proposition in his bill, (that is, in the event that there would be a surplus, and that the revenue could not be reduced,) and as the question whether it could be reduced belonged confessedly to the Committee on Finance, it involved no violation of the parliamentary principle, to which the Senator had alluded, to send his bill to that committee. Mr. R. hoped he would not be understood as wishing, wantonly, to disturb the compromise act. He thought it entitled to respect, as having effected a great national good in restoring peace to the country at a critical moment, full of peril both to the Union and our republican institutions. It was an arrangement, too, on the faith of which large interests, now forming an integral and important part of the national prosperity, had grown up. While, therefore, he saw nothing in that act of the character of a pledge, which could, by any binding force, tie up the hands of future legislation, he was not disposed to disturb its operation for any light or trivial cause, far less from any vindictive feeling of party prejudice. But if the great object of abolishing unnecessary or oppressive taxation, and of bringing down the revenue of the country to the legitimate wants of the Government, cannot otherwise be accomplished, then, and to that extent, he, for one, should feel himself obliged, as in every other case of a sound legislative discretion, to look to the paramount interest of the general good.

REMARKS OF MR. SMITH,

OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, Dec. 16, 1836—in Committee of the Whole—on the motion of Mr. ALEX of Vermont to strike from House bill 152, in favor of the heirs of Colonel A. W. White, the provision allowing interest from July 4, 1780, to the present time, on a claim for advances alleged to have been made to troops during the Revolutionary war.

Mr. SMITH said it could not be otherwise than highly disagreeable to the mind of any gentleman upon this floor, to feel himself under the necessity of opposing any claim that has its origin in, or that has grown out of, services rendered to the country during the revolutionary struggle for its independence. A claim of that denomination commands itself at once to our patriotic feelings; and we all are predisposed, and should be predisposed, to regard it with favor. But, Mr. Chairman, in the payment of public money to satisfy the demands of private individuals upon the Government, it is absolutely indispensable that some general principle be adopted and adhered to, and that all claimants be treated in the same manner. It would be great injustice not to do this, and would, moreover, leave our legislation very much at loose ends. Sir, there must be something strikingly peculiar in the character of that claim, which can be regarded by Government or by Congress as elevated above the high merit of being just and equitable in itself. And, sir, there must be something no less singularly striking and peculiar in the character of that claim, which shall be understandingly paid by the Government, or allowed by Congress, without its being just and equitable in itself. For one, sir, I am disposed to have the Government pay promptly every claim that shall come up to the character of being just or equitable in itself, and I am unwilling to have any paid that fall below this standard; and all that are paid, I would have paid upon one and the same principle, and by one and the same general rule, be that as it may, unless a positive agreement between the claimant and the Government shall constitute any particular claim or exception from the generality of private claims. That different degrees of hardship and misfortune, as well as of benefits and advantages, to individual claimants, will enter into the constitution of their different claims, is to be expected from the very nature of human affairs. But that the Government should undertake to deal out justice more nicely or equally among claimants, by an attempt to pursue their claims through all the incidental shades of merit that may be thought to distinguish some that are allowed, from others that are also allowed, and to favor some over others, appears to my mind entirely impolitic, and impracticable to be accomplished, and would be more productive of inequality and complaint than of equality and satisfaction, in the distribution of the Government's allowances. Sir, I am constrained to oppose such a system, and to know but one rule of payment; and that is, to pay all demands alike that are found to be just against the Government, and to reject all alike that are not found to be of this character.

In relation to the principal or substantive part of the claim now pending before the committee, I have nothing to say. I have not myself had an opportunity of investigating its merits in this particular; but it seems to be conceded on all sides as just in itself; at least I am no quarter have I heard it objected to on this floor. But, sir, it is to the allowance of interest for some forty or fifty years back, that I do make a question, and am constrained to oppose my vote; and I ask the committee to look well to the effect of such allowance upon both the past, present, and future operations of this Government. Are gentlemen prepared to adopt a principle so momentous in its extent, retrospective and prospective, which has never yet been adopted by Congress, unless in some very few cases where it was unobserved, probably, and a principle which has been repeatedly, and I may say uniformly, repudiated by Congress, in the adjustment of claims? Where will it lead us, or where will it end? If, because this claim is just, interest is to be allowed upon that claim from its origin, then, to be just and consistent in our practice, interest should be allowed on every other claim found to be just; for justice can know no medium at which to stop in this particular. And sir, it is not only all present claims, but all future claims, which shall be adjudged just against the Government, that should and must be so settled with interest; and this claim will be an undeniable precedent and authority for it. Nor shall we be permitted to stop here, if we would be consistent, and alike just to all. But all claims that have at any time heretofore been recognised and paid by the Government, without the allowance of interest upon them, will be as fairly and equitably entitled respectively to this same allowance of interest by the Government, as if the principal had never been paid, or as if they were yet to be adjusted. Are gentlemen prepared to go this extent, or to involve the Government in these burdensome but inevitable consequences of the rule proposed to be adopted by this bill? Sir, consider the enormous claims still pending, denominated the French claims prior to 1800, and some of which, to say the least, are as just, perhaps, as even the claim now pending, or are alleged to be so; and are gentlemen prepared to carry out this principle of allowing interest in reference to those claims, and will they do it? Why should a different rule apply to one just claim, and not be conceded to another? If a rule of adjustment be adopted and applied to a present claim, admitted to be just, why not say it shall apply to all future and all past claims also, admitted also to be just? Because a claim has been once settled by the Government, if the settlement did not embrace all that the claimant, upon fair principle, such as the Government is now about to be made to recognise, was entitled to, the Government surely cannot refuse to go back and do the injured party that justice now. How many thousand claims will thus be revived, and upon the basis about to be established in this bill? Will gentlemen but reflect upon the strong equitable character of claims heretofore adjusted by Government, but denied the allowance of interest? When a revenue or custom house officer, or any officer of the Treasury Department, under a misconstruction of a provision of law, has exacted of a merchant an excess of duty upon articles imported by him, and absolutely brought into the Treasury money that such merchant was not bound to pay, Congress has invariably repaid the amount wrongfully exacted, but never a cent of interest upon it. When the property of a citizen has been seized and sold by the Government for the supposed violation of some law, perhaps of a revenue law, and upon adjudication by the proper tribunals, the seizure and sale have been disallowed and demonstrated to have been wrongful, the property of such citizen, or the proceeds of it, have been invariably restored, upon a claim therefor, but not with interest, even though years may have been exhausted in the proceedings. Could more equitable cases be conceived for the application of the rule of interest than were such cases? But, sir, it has not been adopted, because the whole proceeding and delay incident thereto have in all cases been viewed as a misfortune, and not a wrong, and for which the Government ought not, and cannot upon principles of sound policy, be considered as the responsible party. The Government, in such cases, loses the property for which it was contending and was supposed to be entitled to, while the other party recovers it, but with a loss of the use of it while in dispute. In case of a claim in the nature of a debt, long delays are often incident to an allowance. This is a misfortune for which the Government is not, and ought not to be, considered as particularly responsible. It is unavoidable from the nature of government. The claimant himself is a constituent part of the same Government, and shares, in common with his fellow citizens under it, of the advantages and disadvantages flowing from it. If the rule of the Government is to pay the demands justly made upon it, as soon as they are respectively established and passed through the requisite forms instituted for the security of the Treasury of the Government, it is all that can be rightly demanded of it, and the delays incident to their adjustment is a misfortune that each claimant must bear for himself, and constitutes no foundation for an additional claim against the Government. This, sir, I repeat, has been, and must continue to be, I think, the established and only politic rule to be observed by Congress. Any other will lead to confusion, partialities, and injustice. Any other rule would be unjust to the Government itself.

Mr. Chairman, the claim now before us is an old claim, and its advocates allege that it is of the same denomination with those that were provided for by the funding system, of the revolutionary debts, adopted under President Washington's administration, upon which interest was allowed. If this be so, sir, it goes to establish the justice of the debt, but not the justice of the claim now set up for interest upon it. For the question arises at once, if provision was made by Government for the adjustment of this claim at that early period, why was not it adjusted, and the benefit of interest secured to it? The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Craig,) has attempted an explanation of this delay; and if his explanation be taken, it constitutes, to my mind, the most conclusive argument against, instead of in favor of, this claim for interest; for it demonstrates that, so far from involving the Government in fault, the whole fault to have been with the claimant. That gentleman says, the claimant probably omitted to avail himself of the funding act, by which his debt might have been adjusted and interest secured upon it, if well founded, from a conviction that the promises or securities of the Government under the act would never be redeemed and paid. He despaired of ever being paid. Sir, are we then to pay interest for the delay of forty years in the settlement of this claim, because the claimant underrated the worth of the Government's promises, or misconceived the capacity of the Government to pay? With this explanation of the case, the claim for interest most certainly ceases to have any merit whatever, and should not be allowed.

It is said in another quarter, that this case forms an exception to the generality of cases, because the Government agreed to pay interest on this denomination of claims, by the terms of the funding act. But the terms of that act embraced only such claimants as saw proper to, or could avail themselves of it, and beyond this the act neither offered, or agreed, on the part of the Government, to pay interest. This claimant did not avail himself of that agreement; and the very fact that he did not, is calculated to impress the mind with the conviction that something peculiar attached to the claim then, and which does not now appear, to debar it from allowance under the funding act. At all events, Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence of any laches on the part of the Government respecting this claim, to entitle it to peculiar favor. There is no proof of an unwillingness or omission on the part of the Government to pay it, after it has once been established by a compliance with the requisite formalities of legislation. And I do maintain, that the same rule should be applied to it as has been applied to all other claims, which is, to pay it when established satisfactorily, and to pay nothing more on account of any delays that have been incident to its establishment. This has been the uniform rule of Government in all like cases, with perhaps an exception or two that cannot have weight, and it is the only rule that will be just or politic in practice. All hardships arising under this rule must be regarded as misfortunes, and not as wrongs, for the Government will always be just towards individuals, when its necessary requirements are complied with by them. I am constrained to vote in support of the motion of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. Allen,) and trust it will prevail. It involves a great principle that should not be lost sight of, or relaxed, under any circumstances that fall short of a positive agreement on the part of the Government to relax it, entered into at the origin of the claim that seeks to evade it.

SPEECH OF MR. UNDERWOOD,

OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, Dec. 15, 1836—upon the resolution of Mr. Wise, proposing a select committee of investigation, and Mr. Pearce's motion to amend the same.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Kentucky, said that the remarks first made by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Mann,) had afforded him a great deal of pleasure, for it seemed from them that the gentleman was in favor of the fullest and most thorough examination of the Departments which could be made; and it also seemed that the heads of the Departments, conscious of having discharged their duty, courted investigation, because they knew it would result to their credit, and confirm their claim to public confidence. But, sir, (said Mr. U.) the concluding remarks of the gentleman from New York, in which he preferred the amendment offered by the member from Rhode Island to the original resolution, appeared to me inconsistent with those declarations, favorable to that full and latitudinous investigation, which were made in the first part of his speech. What, I ask, is the difference between the original resolution, adopted by the Committee of the Whole, and the proposed amendment? The original allows an unrestricted examination; the amendment would confine it to specified charges, to be made before the examination is commenced. The committee will not be tied down to any particular charge, or to any narrow course of inquiry, by the original resolution. This would be to permit that full and untrammelled examination which could not fail to expose the hidden things of darkness and corruption, if the Departments are guilty, and to which I thought the member from New York had fully assented. [Here Mr. Mann asked leave to explain, and said that he was in favor of a full and thorough examination, but his objection consisted in the generality of the investigation without specifications, a course which seemed to him too much like a general search warrant, and therefore inconsistent with sound constitutional principles, and he hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would take his idea.] I think (said Mr. U.)

I comprehend the gentleman from New York, and will not pervert his meaning. If we were in pursuit of stolen goods, and desired to search for them, the gentleman's idea is correct. We should then be bound to specify the article lost, and the place where we expected to find it; and, before subjecting a citizen to the humiliating process of having his private apartments searched, the Constitutions of the United States and State of Kentucky, and probably of every other State in this Union, would require an oath or affirmation in support of the facts before the magistrate issues the warrant, and then the warrant should specify the place to be searched, and the thing to be taken. But sir, who ever heard these well settled constitutional principles, until now, applied to political investigations, to the examination of the Departments of this or any other Government? Has it come to this, that, when we ask for the appointment of a committee to ascertain whether our affairs have been properly managed and conducted by the servants of the People, gentlemen consider the proceeding analogous to the pursuit of thieves and stolen property, and contend that we ought to proceed with the same caution and formality? Sir, such a suggestion can result from nothing less than inconsiderate zeal in support of men who may be pure, and who ought to court, rather than shun, investigation, if their conduct fears no scrutiny. The idea that there is something wrong in a general commission or warrant to search and examine the political movements and official conduct of the Departments of this Government, seems to me totally at variance with the genius of all our institutions. What are the Departments of this Government? Nothing but executive trusts, confided to agents, to be exercised according to the will and for the benefit of the People. The trustee or agent is amenable and responsible to the People; and how can that responsibility be enforced unless the People, whenever they choose, and at all times, can look into, and examine as they please, the records and official acts of every public functionary? And how, sir, can the people do this, unless it be through their representatives upon this floor? I demand it as a right, in the name of my constituents, and in their behalf I call for the practical exercise of that right, which will enable a committee of this House to lay before them the official correspondence of every Secretary, the condition of their offices, and the whole evidences of their official conduct, whether it be good or whether it be evil.

If such an examination be not legitimate—if we have no such power—then indeed are the officers of Government placed above the reach of the people, and from nominal servants have become practical masters. The ample investigation tolerated by the gentleman from New York is coupled with the condition that we shall first charge some specific offence, and then he would allow us to examine the records, without restriction, for evidence in support of it. Now, sir, such proceeding would be well calculated to turn the investigation into ridicule. It would be necessary, if that be the appropriate course, to form charges and specifications by guessing, and unless we happened to guess right, the whole investigation would amount to nothing, for I suppose no one will contend that conviction under impeachment, or public condemnation, would be the result, where the prosecutors had wholly mistaken the nature and character of the offence, and had exhibited charges totally variant from those sustained by the proof. Sir, I am not disposed to commence the investigation by guessing; but I am truly anxious to have an inspection of all the records of the several Departments, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there has been any misfeasance or malfeasance committed. If any can be found, then it is time to bring forward the accusation. If none exist, then an honest committee should proclaim to the nation, that all is well; and those who, from ill-founded suspicions, have insisted upon the investigation, would feel the blush of shame for having done injustice, in their thoughts, to the virtuous patriots who, uninfluenced by selfish and corrupt motives, have only labored to promote the great interests of the country.

The true question is, whether we have a right to make the examination before charging any offence; or, must we specify offences at random, and then call for a committee to ascertain their truth? If it was a mere copartnership between the heads of the departments and the representatives of the people, we should have the right to inspect their books and papers, and a refusal on their part to let us do it would be just cause for dissolving the concern. But, sir, it is not a copartnership in political trade, where each member of the firm shares the profits, according to the capital of intrigue and management he contributes. Such a doctrine is only current with those whose motto is "to the victors belong the spoils." The people of this nation, in whose place we stand, do not admit the existence of any partnership with their rulers. It is no joint stock company. Those who rule in the Executive Department are the mere agents of the people, the trustees for their use; and we, temporarily clothed with the power of the people, as their representatives, have the same right to call upon those agents and trustees to exhibit all their books, records, and accounts, touching the affairs of the Government, that the merchant has to call upon his factor, or the landlord upon his steward. Sir, this right is the true basis of American liberty; it is the essence of responsibility; and if it be not practically exercised, the people can never settle their accounts, or know how they stand with their rulers; and when the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Ripley) seemed to deny the very existence of such a right, I felt that he was uttering sentiments and opinions more congenial to the monarchical atmosphere of Europe, than the republican expanse which encircles the States of this Union. If there is no such right, liberty is dead, and despotism reigns.

But, sir, the abstracted right has not been positively denied, although it has been treated as if it did not exist; and the manner proposed for its exercise by the amendment of the gentleman from Rhode Island, rather implies a want of right or authority to send out a committee to make a general examination. The gentleman from Rhode Island is an astute lawyer, and, if he will reflect a moment, he must be sensible that the course indicated by his amendment, is a departure from the settled practice in courts of justice, designed to bring the violators of the penal code to punishment. By their practice the grand jury is first impanelled and sworn to inquire; and, sir, the grand jury is unrestricted in its inquiries. It has no limits, but may take a range of investigation coextensive with the penal laws of the land. The grand jury indicts and presents, and gives shape and form to the charge. After the grand jury has specified the time, place, circumstances, and manner of the crime, then comes the venire, and the accused is put upon his trial. The gentleman's amendment reverses the order of things. He would have the prosecutor to state the charge by guessing, and without the examination of any witness before the grand jury, or a court of inquiry, and then he would forthwith enter upon the trial. Only indulge the gentleman in such a course—a course which subverts the settled wisdom of the country, growing out of the experience of ages—and I will venture to say that no culprit ever could be convicted, with the gentleman's talents employed in the defence. This House is the grant inquest of this nation, and I, for one, Mr. Speaker, will never consent to trammel its investigations by adopting a limited rule, such as the amendment proposes.

The gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. Ripley,) seems to consider the original resolution, which contemplates an examination of the Departments in all their ramifications, as an insinuation against the integrity of the President. He, (Mr. R.) will not look into the condition of the Departments, because the President has certified that all is well, and to look for himself and his constituents after that, would be to suspect the truth and honesty of the President.

I was astonished to hear such sentiments avowed on this floor. They are, in my opinion, exotic plants which should never be permitted to take root in American soil. It is the doctrine of passive obedience, of quiet acquiescence in the will of a master. Sir, the gentleman forgets that eternal vigilance is the condition upon which public liberty depends. We should receive nothing without examination, without sifting it thoroughly, and ascertaining for ourselves and our constituents all its properties and qualities. If we are to take things on trust, our presence here might as well be dispensed with, and we had better surrender at once all the powers of Government into the hands of a truthful and honest President. Sir, I have nothing to do with the truth or honesty of the President. I shall neither concede nor deny him these qualities upon this occasion. By his "fruits" I know him. But as he is soon to retire from his station, and as it does not affect the principles for which I am contending, whether he is truthful and honest or otherwise, I shall not stop to inquire into such personal qualities. But suppose it were conceded that his character for truth and honesty stands as high as his warmest admirers would place it, are we to abstain from an examination into the conduct of our public functionaries, and the situation of their offices, merely because the President is of opinion they have done their duty? The President's certificate in their behalf is nothing more than his opinion; he does not inform us that he has made a minute and personal examination into the condition of the Departments, and that his opinion is the result of such examination. We know that the President's official duties have required a great deal of his time. His absence last summer, and his recent illness, connected with his official engagements, have allowed him very little time to devote to the examination of the Departments; and hence, sir, this House and this nation may form a very different opinion in regard to the heads of the Departments and their conduct, from that expressed by the President; and all this may be done without assailing his personal character.

The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. Pearce) seemed to oppose the proposed investigation, because he apprehended there was a lurking purpose to depreciate, if not slander, the characters of those who are at the head of the Executive Departments. I am equally sensible, with that gentleman, of the value to this nation of the reputation of our public men, and I have had cause to regret the unmerited reproaches and vile calumnies which are often cast upon them by a corrupt partisan press; but I cannot perceive any good reason for opposing the original resolution, lest the characters of those high in office might suffer by its adoption. We must take it for granted that the committee will report nothing but facts. If the facts are of such a nature as to produce censure, degradation of character, and expulsion from office, it will be much more creditable to the nation and its institutions to expose the base motives and bad acts of exalted functionaries, than to leave them unmolested in their high places, presenting a fair exterior to dupe the world, while all is disgusting filth and rottenness within. I admit there is a diminution of national character whenever any of our high officers are shown to be unworthy of their stations; but we had better lose in this respect than to wink at corruption for the sake of appearances. By detecting, exposing, and punishing, political criminals, those who offend against the statutes and principles of liberty, there is a national gain of reputation, which more than counterbalances the loss I have mentioned. The gain consists in the manifestation of a sound state of moral and political sentiment, which will not allow offenders to escape with impunity; and the assurance we find in the stern political virtue which condemns the official knave, that our free institutions are destined to last forever. Now, sir, let us test those principles of loss and gain, by instituting the fullest and most unlimited inquiry; and if the result is, as some predict, that the characters of our Cabinet Ministers will shine the brighter from having passed the ordeal, the nation will gain much by the conviction that existing suspicions are not well founded, and by the increase of the reputations of those high functionaries.

It has been said that the original resolution proposes a new thing, for which there is no precedent in the history of this Government. Grant it, and what of that? Is not the President's laudatory certificate in behalf of all the Executive Departments and their officers a new thing in the history of this Government? What former President ever did the like? If the President introduces a new practice, may we not meet it by an appropriate novelty? If the original resolution is amended, it should be done by providing for the appointment of a separate committee to examine each department. One committee, I fear, cannot go through the whole. If such a practice had prevailed, as I think it ought to have done, from the commencement of the Government, I have no doubt that many things which have been improperly done would not have taken place. Early impressions, Mr. Speaker, are never forgotten. The first lesson taught me as a member of the Kentucky Legislature, many years since, was the propriety of appointing annually a committee to examine each department of the Government of that State, and to report upon its condition. The offices of our State—Auditor, Treasurer, Register, &c. &c. are annually examined by a separate committee, and reported on. We do not take the Governor's word that all things are going on well; but the representatives of the People investigate for themselves and their constituents, and the same practice should prevail in this Government, henceforth and forever.

If, Mr. Speaker, I have satisfied the House that we possess the power to make a general examination in the condition of the Departments, without stating beforehand any specific abuse or malfeasance as the object of inquiry; if such power necessarily results from the legislative powers vested in us by the Constitution, and from the power of impeachment, then there is nothing left to be considered but the propriety of exercising the power at this time. It is nothing more nor less than an exercise of the right to examine a Department when this House calls for a report. We have as much right to appoint a committee to ascertain a fact by inspecting the records of a Department, as to require the head of the same Department, or the chief of any bureau, to report as to the particular fact, upon his inspection. Suppose a question should arise whether the fact is truly reported, how can you decide unless you have the power to examine? I dismiss the argument in regard to the right of a general examination, and will proceed to show the propriety of its exercise.

Will it interest the people of this country, and of the whole civilized world, to know whether there are corrupt combinations existing among the officers of this Government, to aid and assist each other in procuring and retaining for themselves and their relatives offices and the emoluments thereof? Is it advisable to ascertain, in this the freest Government on earth, how far the spirit of despotism can or has obtained power to proscribe and punish those who dare to assert with boldness, and to maintain with independence, their principles of policy and their opinions in regard to men? Will it have a salutary influence among the lovers of justice and votaries of freedom, to expose the wicked schemes of self-aggrandizement, which sometimes corrupt the wholesome administration of the laws, and infuse a deadly poison into the legislation of a country? If these questions are affirmatively answered, then, sir, we ought now to raise a committee and require an examination according to the original resolution. Whether the committee would find, by their investigation, facts to alarm a nation, or to cheer it on its forward march to greatness in population, in wealth, in resources, need not be anticipated. The committee would certainly find facts of the one kind or the other; and the investigation would necessarily result in pointing out dangers which threaten our destruction, or in confirming our hopes of the durability of our institutions. Either result is desirable, and hence we should not hesitate to adopt the original resolution.

I will suggest some things which could be done, and which could not fail to be deeply interesting to the public. Shortly after the election of General Jackson as President, the postmaster at Glasgow, Kentucky, was removed from office. He did not vote for General Jackson. A political pastisan was appointed in his place. The removed postmaster had the business of the office conducted to the satisfaction of the people, so far as I am informed. During the last session, charges of malfeasance were forwarded to me against the then incumbent, so satisfactorily sustained by proof, that the Postmaster General removed the incumbent, and appointed another in his place. Now, sir, the documents by which the removal of the postmaster last session was accomplished, are no doubt on file in the Post Office Department. The documents and charges upon which the first removal took place ought also to be there, and doubtless are. I would have an examining committee inspect these documents, and collect from them the principle of action with the department, which, in the first instance, caused the removal of a competent and faithful officer, without any complaint against him, and the appointment of an individual, a political partisan, afterwards removed for malfeasance. A similar inquiry should be had in all other like cases. In the progress of the examination, I would also examine the correspondence and documents relative to the removal of the postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky, and the appointment of Alfred Hocker in his place! I presume the House are not ignorant of one act, at least, performed by this notorious personage; and every gentleman, no doubt, has heard that when he demanded possession of the books, papers, &c. of the office to which he had been appointed, the young man having charge of them refused to surrender upon the first summons; and upon a passionate inquiry from Hocker, as to his authority for withholding the papers, the youth calmly replied, "Just the same which you had to withhold the Lincoln poll-book." Sir, I should like to know, I think it would be beneficial to this nation to ascertain the motives and principles of one of the Departments of this Government, which led to the appointment of a man to hold a highly important office, who, but for the constitutional provision against ex post facto laws, would, in all human probability, have been a penitentiary convict at the date of his appointment. I would have the committee examine and re-examine the recommendations and correspondence relative to the appointment of Mr. Hocker. [Here a gentleman near Mr. U. suggested, in an under tone, "that they were probably burnt up by the fire last night." Mr. U. continued:] I hope not, sir. When I reached the conflagration, that part of the building appropriated to the use of the General Post Office was so far uninjured as to admit free access to the interior of it without danger, and there was ample time to have secured all important papers. I trust, sir, there has been no destruction of any which relate to removals from, and appointments to office. These papers, if thoroughly scrutinized, will, I apprehend, exhibit combinations of depravity which would startle a confiding, unsuspecting people, and call into active operation that vigilance, that perpetual vigilance, without which knavery is destined to triumph over honesty, and liberty to fall under the machinations of tyrants. Sir, I desire that the committee should examine all the correspondence in each of the Departments relative to removals and appointments. I want to know whether the Jeffersonian rule, "Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution," governs the Departments in making appointments; or whether this be the rule now practised on, "Is he a voter, how did he vote, and how many votes can he control in all future contests for power?" You may suppress this inquiry if you dare; but, sir, unless the American people have utterly lost that character which brought their fathers through the storms of the revolution, they will ultimately bring to light the hidden secrets of all your Departments.

There are other objects to which a committee of investigation could and should turn their attention. During the last session, a member from New York (Mr. Hunt) was placed at the head of a committee, raised by the order of this House, for the purpose of inquiring into the speculations made in the public lands by members of Congress, and the facilities afforded them for that purpose by the deposit banks. He was unable to go through with the investigation, and asked further time, which was refused. Now, sir, the committee appointed, if the original resolution is adopted, can ascertain a great many facts in regard to the public lands, and the speculations carried on in them, which may have a very important influence upon the deliberations and legislation of this House. They can ascertain at the Land Office the quantity of acres sold to each individual and company for the last two years, and when each sale was made. They can ascertain the names of the purchasers, and then they can ascertain what sums of money have been loaned to these purchasers by the deposit banks, and when the loans were made, provided the officers of these banks do not say to them "that is none of your business." Thus, sir, a committee, by going properly to work, can obtain from the records of one Department and the books of the deposit banks all the information necessary to elucidate the subject of inquiry confided to the committee of which the gentleman from New York (Mr. Hunt) was chairman, and, by so doing, avoid wounding the delicate sensibility and fastidious honor of certain witnesses, who might refuse to answer certain questions, if called to testify.

From the Land Office the committee might pass over to the Treasury, and ascertain how much gold and silver had been there deposited to pay for lands, and in whose favor Treasury certificates of deposit were issued, and the amount of each. Thus, sir, the whole operations of our land system, for the last two years, might be developed in a report, pregnant with useful facts, and leading to important consequences in our legislation.

I shall say nothing more, believing, as I do, that if the suggestions made are not sufficient to satisfy this House of the propriety of raising a committee, and vesting it with unrestricted powers to examine the Departments, all else will fail to have the desired effect.

SPEECH OF MR. RIPLEY, OF LOUISIANA,

IN REPLY TO MR. PEYTON, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, Dec. 15, 1836—
Upon the resolution of Mr. Wise, proposing a select committee of investigation, and Mr. Pearce's motion to amend the same.

MR. SPEAKER: Had this been a proposition to inquire into the condition of the Department of State, of the Treasury, of the Navy and War Departments, and the General Post Office, with a view to investigate abuses, if they exist, no person would be more willing to join in the inquiry than myself. No individual would be more anxious to enforce the responsibility of subordinate officers. There are none who will go farther to ferret out any malpractices; and, if they really exist, to punish them with the high constitutional power of this House. Had the resolution for inquiry had these objects solely and honestly in view, I should have been the last to oppose it. But, sir, the President is constitutionally responsible for the whole of the Executive Department; the various radii of its powers concentrate, as well its responsibilities as its honors, upon him; and when I take these circumstances into view, and consider also the spirit in which this debate has been conducted, the position of the President cannot be observed without exciting our share of sympathy. Shall we, at a moment when his connection with the people of the United States is about to terminate for ever, and all the aspirations of ambition are to be dissolved by age, infirmities, and sickness; when the consciousness of his high and devoted services, which we all know he must possess, and the enthusiastic affection of the American people were about to cheer the evening of his life, and to gild his expiring lamp, is it right or proper for the representatives of the people whom he has succored and saved, to cut off this departing solace, and to embitter his last days, by adopting a resolution, which, if adopted, will sanction an opinion of this House, that corruption and Andrew Jackson have been coupled together? Will they do this without some specific charge—without some definite allegation, sustained at least by the endorsement of one individual in the House who will be willing to give his name to posterity as the author of the allegation? In the speech of the honorable member from Tennessee, marked with so much wit and pungency of satire, the allegations are made against Andrew Jackson as the object who is to be convicted of the corruption which is so broadly insinuated in the resolution to exist in the Executive Department. I am not willing to exercise the high constitutional powers of this House in the least degree in sanctioning such an allegation.

General Jackson, after a life spent in the service of his country, is about retiring from the elevated position he holds as presiding Executive officer of these States, at an advanced age, and worn down by the labors spent in that service. He is now, sir, on the bed of sickness, which may prove his bed of death. God grant that it may not; but that he may live many, many years amongst that people whose rights he has so bravely and honestly defended, and whose prosperity, under his successful administration, has excited the astonishment of the whole civilized world.

What, sir, is the relation that Andrew Jackson bears to the representatives of the people of the United States? From the period of your Revolutionary war to the present moment, he has been the lofty, indefatigable defender of his country. In war and in peace, on the battle field and in your councils, his exertions, his toils, and unceasing energy and integrity, have done as much as any other man, not excepting your Washington in the field, and your Jefferson and Madison in the cabinet, to elevate the character of this Republic, to advance its prosperity, and to preserve its peace. His name has been a tower of strength, and under his administration the character of an American citizen, as was that formerly of a Roman citizen, a passport throughout the world. Ay, sir, in foreign lands, wherever your star-spangled banner displays from the high and giddy mast, the character of our Republic, under the ægis of the lofty virtues of the President, has that wall of strength that feels ever conscious of the protection of a great and powerful nation. And would you, sir, would this House, after a life thus spent, and which impartial History is about to take charge of for the benefit of his country; would they at the eve of his long life, so worthily spent in all that is patriotic and virtuous in the public service; would they pursue him with insinuations that corruption, with its blighting mildew, had found entrance into the bosom of Jackson's more than Roman virtue? If this House institutes the inquiry, it sanctions the charge, and will they, without any specific allegations, just at the close of General Jackson's career, hold the fatal chalice to his lips, which should poison and embitter with the stings of ingratitude the evening of his life? We have had no precedent to justify such a measure. Party spirit has raged and misrepresented all your Presidents during their term of office, but they have passed and are passing off the stage, all with the award of official and personal integrity. Some have not been re-elected by the people, but against them no charge of corruption is found embodied in the annals of the country. Nor does any American citizen, at even this lapse of time, impeach their integrity: no one charges them with wilful or wanton corruption, while administering the affairs of the Commonwealth. The only allegations made against them, as they quit the scene of their labors, of their glories and their services, were that a distinguished member, formerly from Virginia, accused Mr. Jefferson of retiring with a political falsehood in his mouth; and an equally distinguished member from Massachusetts moved his solitary vote to impeach Mr. Madison. I have no doubt, sir, after the excitement of party was over, both of these gentlemen regretted these allegations. The charges never have, and never will affect the great patriarch of liberty, the author of the Declaration of Independence, or his equally illustrious friend, the founder and champion of our Constitution. The one unfurled to the world the principles of popular government; the other, more than any man, connected liberty with law—secured an equality of political rights, by securing to society the fruits of labor. Wherever oppressed man rises to resist the oppressor, the Declaration drawn up by Thomas Jefferson is invoked. Wherever constitutional law is appealed to, to secure those rights, the political writings of James Madison form the pure fountains of living water, which diffuse liberty and tranquillity amongst the nations. Together, locked hand in hand, they are working their silent way, and they have planted that school of political liberty, of which this Republic may arrogate to itself, through their exertions, the being the founder.

Republics have been accused of being ungrateful. Aristides was ostracised for being called the Just, and Themistocles banished, after saving his country from desolation. The authors of these acts have not transmitted their names to posterity. How keen would be the reproaches of the history of the last two thousand years, how withering their infamy, if they had not escaped by this silence of history. Gen. Jackson has been doomed to meet the same ingratitude, after preventing the dismemberment of our Republic, after rescuing the fair and fertile fields of the State which I have the honor to represent. There, sir, helpless age and tender youth, and all the charms of refinement and beauty, were protected by his hand. There, sir, was effected one of those signal deliverances of a people which has already caused the plains of New Orleans to rank with Marathon and Platea, reflecting all its bright lustre upon the army of liberty that fought under him, and sending all its glowing light throughout the world to elevate the character of this Republic. Sir, almost at the moment this was effecting, and while painting, history, poetry, music, and sculpture were giving greenness to his immortality, the Senate of the United States were denouncing him in the Seminole war. Sickening with the same feelings that were pained at hearing Aristides called the Just, the detractors of Andrew Jackson loathed the beau ideal of his character. Again, during the panic, that same body have impeached and condemned him without a trial, for an alleged violation of the Constitution of the United States. How, sir, have the people met these charges? They have almost by acclamation elected him President on each occasion. They have rallied to defend him. Where, sir, are his accusers? I ask again, where are they? And, sir, permit me to predict that if the present resolution passes, it will only reflect disgrace upon the present House of Representatives. The people will come to the rescue, and expunge the resolution from this House, as I trust they are about expunging a former one from the Senate. The whole future history of the country will hold up in proud relief their old chief sans peur and sans reproche, and the ingratitude of this House in pursuing him with the odious charge of corruption, even upon the bed of sickness and of death, when I do not believe there can be a member here who conscientiously believes that Andrew Jackson ever was, in thought, word, or deed, unfaithful or inimical to the interests of this country.

I regret that the honorable member from Tennessee should have been so excited by a warm election contest, as to urge, upon such trivial grounds as he has alleged, so grave an inquiry into the corrupt conduct of the Executive departments. The State of Tennessee has been reared under the fostering and paternal care of Andrew Jackson. He has done more than any other man to elevate and form its character. Intelligent, chivalric, patriotic, and virtuous, they will be the last portion of the people of the United States to sanction allegations, either personal or as the constitutional head of the Government, against their veteran chief. Those brave men who followed his banner through the Creek nation and on the plains of New Orleans, with the citizen soldiers of Kentucky, Mississippi, and Louisiana, are not to prove so recreant to Andrew Jackson, and so unfaithful to themselves, as to embitter the remnant of his days with so unjust an accusation. And what are all the allegations that the honorable member adduces to justify the exercise of the high constitutional power of this House? That the President, in a conversation with a friend, had remarked that Mr. BELL, another member from Tennessee, had stated lies about him, and that "Peyton could tell twenty lies to Bell's one." Now, sir, what were the facts in the case? The honorable members from Tennessee at the last session had indulged in pretty severe censures upon the President's administration. In conversation with his neighbors, according to this statement, in naturally vindicating himself, he had pretty warmly recriminated. I think the language that he made use of, as is usual on such occasions, must have undergone, in the course of its gossip, some version before it reached the ears of the honorable member; for it is not the language of that delicate and manly bearing which all know mark the character of Andrew Jackson. At any rate, is a mere controversy in an election, where the President and the honorable members from Tennessee, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, supported different candidates, to be the basis of an inquisitorial examination on the part of this House into the conduct of the Executive Departments?

Again, the honorable member alleges that his House refused to institute an inquiry into frauds that were perpetrated upon the Indians of Alabama by the citizens of that State in the sales of their lands to individuals. When that resolution was introduced into the House, I had the honor of proposing an amendment to it, referring the subject to the President of the United States. The motive for this amendment was, that this House had no constitutional power to order the investigation by their authority; and, if it had been done, it would have been one of the most fatal precedents to the rights of the States. It was alleged that the Indians had been swindled out of their reserved lands, in many cases, by residents of Georgia and Alabama. Of course, if offences had been committed, as I know of no law of the United States providing for such cases, they were common law or statute law offences against those States, not cognizable by the United States tribunal. In a case where the State of Alabama secures a speedy trial by jury, and the cross-examination of witnesses, would any person arrogate to this House the power to send its committee to make an ex parte investigation, to hold up its citizens as malefactors without being heard, without the privilege of counsel, and the cross-examining of witnesses? Suppose, sir, that, in obtaining the charter of a bank in a neighboring State, respectable citizens should be accused of fraud and bribery, an offence that is punishable by the common law of that State, does this House, sir, possess the power to trample upon State rights, and send its committee of inquiry into the halls of the State Legislature, to hunt up ex parte testimony as its basis, and to hunt down all that is respectable and venerable in the character of its citizens, to condemn them unheard without grand jurors or petit jurors, and draw up a withering report that would blast them as far as our language extended before they had an opportunity of defending themselves? If this power had been exercised by the original resolutions of last session, like the Council of Ten at Venice, or the Holy Inquisition of Spain, it would have sung the requiem of public liberty, and broken down the whole penal jurisdiction of the independent States. And I feel peculiar personal consolation in being the means of arresting the progress of a measure so fraught with disastrous consequences. The subject was referred to the President, who was directed to investigate into the cases of fraud. From the character of the agent employed by the President, (General Hogan,) I feel confident, from my knowledge of the man, that the duty has been faithfully attended to; and if, as the honorable member suggests, he has received the collectorship of Mobile, it cannot have been conferred upon a more deserving or more intelligent citizen, or one who has more gallantly defended his country during the gloomiest period of the late war.*

The honorable member has also referred to the Secretary of the Treasury as being embraced in the general allegation of corruption. Sir, the lofty character of Levi Woodbury is too well known to this House and to this nation, to require any comment from me. Born, reared, and educated amidst the granite mountains of my native State, his stern and sterling virtues had already carried him to the highest honors of New Hampshire, when in the midst of the panic battle, he was called to the arduous duties of the Treasury of the United States. New England may justly feel proud of the high character which he has reflected back upon his native land. And let me ask, what inducement to corruption can there be on the part of Levi Woodbury? There has been no specific charge against him; not a whisper of prejudice that he has done any thing to forfeit his exalted character. He is affluent in his personal situation, with every thing to make him happy in domestic life; and, above all, principles of the most stern and unbending integrity are interwoven with his nature. The only allegation insinuated against him is, that, in the exercise of his duty imposed by a law passed by this House, he is compelled to transact official business with the agent of the deposit banks. That agent is no officer of this Government; we have no constitutional power over him. He has been assailed by the severest epithets of party. He has been employed by the deposit banks, many of them in opposition to the administration, to attend to their business with the Treasury. For my own part, I do not learn any specific charges with which he is accused. And I have no doubt that the President, when he gave him the character which the honorable member states that he did at Jonesborough, came to the honest and conscientious conviction that such a torrent of anathemas from the opposition in this House, assailing the character of this man for more than four years, would have annihilated him had not his reputation been founded upon the rock of integrity. High-sounding epithets and bold denunciations cannot, thank God, blast the character of any American citizen, unless they are accompanied with specific allegations and specific proofs. On the contrary, they raise in the generous minds of the American people that spirit of sympathy for unmerited persecution which is sure to protect its intended victim, and roll back the current upon the author.

I feel, sir, that I should have but unworthily discharged my duty as a representative of Louisiana, had I not raised my voice in opposition to this resolution. Whatever may be the personal or political predilections of my constituents, gratitude to Andrew Jackson for the inestimable benefits he has conferred upon the citizens of our State is an almost pervading sentiment. It is, like the vestal flame, guarded with intense care, and faithfully transmitted from one generation to another. As the 8th of January revolves its annual rounds, so often does the hoary veteran who shared in the memorable campaign repair to the grass-worn hillock which marks the battle field, and recite the eventful story to his children. Often are time and space annihilated, and the years of his pilgrimage recalled to the desperate conflict; and in those rural fetes, which none knows better how to grace with refinement and beauty than the gallant Frank of our sunny clime, the revered name of Andrew Jackson is never forgotten, and the choicest of Heaven's blessings are invoked upon the patriot's head.

SEECH OF MR. NILES, OF CONNECTICUT,

In Senate, December 22, 1836.—On the resolution of Mr. EWING of Ohio, for rescinding the Treasury order of the 11th July, 1836.

Mr. President: I had intended to submit some remarks on the resolution before the Senate, and may as well do it at this time as any other. In the course of the debate, there has been several topics drawn into consideration, not necessarily embraced in the question to be decided, yet somewhat connected with the general subject. Some of these I shall have occasion to allude to as I proceed; but will here notice one preliminary observation of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster.) That Senator took occasion to say that the vote on this resolution would form a test question; that those who vote against the resolution will be understood as being favorable to the ultra, and, as he regarded them, extreme opinions of the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) regarding the currency and the public revenue, and observed that it might be fortunate the public is to be thus early apprized of what is to be the policy of the majority, and of the coming administration, on those important subjects. He had heard the remark with some surprise, not thinking it called for or justified by the occasion. Without stopping to inquire what are the opinions of the Senator from Missouri, or what they are considered to be by the gentleman from Massachusetts, he must be permitted to say that no such conclusions could justly follow the decision of the question before the Senate.

There were reasons, he thought weighty reasons, which would justify Senators in voting against this resolution, without committing themselves in any sense, or in any degree, in regard to the great questions of currency and revenue, to which the Senator had referred. Without reference to what might be his opinion as to the true policy of the Government in the collection of the revenue, whether from the public lands or the customs, he was prepared to vote against this resolution. To pass this resolution, would be to censure and condemn an act of the Executive as being wrong, ab initio, or at the time of its adoption. Whether the rule prescribed in the Treasury order be a wise and just one, for the settled action of the Government, is a question entirely distinct from that, whether it may have been expedient and proper at the time it was adopted. He was satisfied that the Treasury order could be justified, viewed as a temporary measure only, intended to remedy evils of great magnitude, arising from the extraordinary circumstances connected with the sales of the public lands; and he was not sure that this was not the true light in which it ought to be considered. It was the duty of the Executive to watch over the public revenue, and see that it was secure. Was there no hazard from the extensive and gambling speculations in the public lands paid for only in bank bills, which were handed over by the Receivers to the deposit banks, and placed to the credit of the United States? A large portion of the purchases were paid for in bills of the deposit banks, which, after going into the hands of the Receivers, were returned and loaned out again, to go through the same operation. This was virtually reviving the old credit system, as the United States received nothing but credit for the lands. If there was no hazard to the revenue from these practices, and from the magnitude and extent of the sales, made upon this kind of credit, then gentlemen over the way had altered their opinions very much within the last six months. During the last session of Congress, we were repeatedly, and almost daily told by those who now oppose the Treasury order, that the funds of the Government in the western deposit banks were insecure, and that nothing but credit was received for the public lands. Can gentlemen have forgotten their often-repeated declarations on this subject? If so, they must be blessed with short memories. Again and again did Senators refer to the small amount of specie in those banks, and an impression was attempted to be made, that their specie funds were the only solid security for the large sums due the United States.

The order was calculated, and, to a considerable extent, no doubt, has corrected this evil. It insured something valuable for the lands, and that something valuable was transferred to the deposit banks, and formed a more solid basis for the Government credits.

The order was also calculated to check speculation in the public lands, which, in itself, was an evil of no small magnitude, transferring the best part of the national domain into the hands of heartless speculators, to the great injury of actual settlers, and the detriment of the whole country. Public opinion was rising up against it, and required that something should be done to arrest an evil of so extensive and serious a nature. What other or better measure could have been adopted, until Congress should convene, which might adopt such further legislation in regard to the sales of the lands, as the public interests may require?

Sir, (said Mr. N.) there is another reason why I cannot vote for the resolution before the Senate. A new rule has been adopted in regard to the sale of the public lands, that has been in operation for a time, and which has a tendency to check speculation. I would not repeal that rule, and open again the floodgates of speculation—certainly not until I know whether Congress will pass any act regulating the sale of the public lands. It is, I think, the duty of Congress to do this; the interest of the country requires it; public sentiment demands it; and it is strongly recommended by the President. If Congress suffer the session to pass off, without attempting to regulate the sale of the public lands, so as to check speculation, they will neglect their duty to the country. Believing that there will be additional legislation on the subject, which may supersede the Treasury order, he was not, at this time, prepared to disturb it. Changes in any extensive business are always attended with some inconvenience, and should be avoided as much as possible. When it shall be settled that Congress will not alter the system, it may become necessary to decide whether the rule prescribed in the order shall be maintained, or the old practice restored; and if we do any thing on this subject, our action should be more comprehensive; it should embrace the whole subject, and be settled by law, what currency shall be received for the payment of the revenues; not only from the lands, but from customs and all other dues. The doubt and uncertainty which hangs over this subject ought to be removed.

For these reasons, therefore, he should vote against rescinding the Treasury order, even if he was satisfied that the rule it prescribes was not one which it would be expedient and just to establish as a settled policy.

In this view of the subject, he had thrown out of the case the legal objection which has been raised against the Treasury order.

Mr. President, there are two general grounds of objection that have been urged against the order, which the resolution on your table proposes to rescind, which I will proceed to consider. The first objection is, that it is illegal; the second, that its operation is partial, unjust, and injurious to the country, and has been the principal cause of the embarrassments and pressure for money, which have been so extensively experienced.

It has also been claimed by the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) that the order is unconstitutional, that it conflicts with that provision of the constitution, which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the rights and immunities of the citizens of the several States." This, however, is a very small point, so small that the Senator seemed to find it difficult to stand upon it; it was quite too small for him to waste the time of the Senate about, and he should therefore pass it over.

Is the Treasury order contrary to law? If it is, it ought to be rescinded without regard to other considerations?

Congress is empowered to lay taxes, and to authorize and regulate the sale of the public lands; and in doing this, it can no doubt direct the kind of money or currency which shall be received in payment. But if it neglect to do this, it becomes the duty of the Executive, who is charged with executing the law, to receive payment for taxes and lands in the legal currency of the United States. What that legal currency is, there can be no dispute, so that the only question which can arise, is, whether there is any law which authorizes the payment of the revenue and debts due the United States, in any other currency, or in any other way? It is claimed that the joint resolution of 1816, requires the Secretary of the Treasury to collect the taxes and debts due the United States, in a currency different from the legal currency of the country. That resolution provides, "that the Secretary of the Treasury be required and directed to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary, to cause, as soon as may be, all duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, to be collected and paid in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, as by law provided and declared, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency of the United States; and that from and after the twentieth day of February next, no such duties, taxes, debts, or sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States as aforesaid, ought to be collected or received otherwise than in the legal currency of the United States, or Treasury notes, or notes of the Bank of the United States, or in notes of banks which are payable and paid, on demand, in the said legal currency of the United States."

The Senator from Massachusetts, in a labored legal argument, has attempted to prove that this resolution creates a peculiar currency, in regard to all branches of the public revenue, and all debts due the United States. He not only maintains that the resolution imposes an obligation on the Secretary to receive the notes of all banks that redeem their bills in specie at their counters, but also that it enlarges the rights of payors; that it confers on the debtors of the United States the legal right to pay their debts in paper currency; that is, in the notes of specie-paying banks. He went so far as to assert, and stake his reputation as a lawyer on the question, that a Receiver, who should refuse to receive the notes of specie-paying banks, and which were known to him to be such, would render himself liable to an action by the party injured. He admits that the fact that the notes are issued by banks which pay their bills in specie, must be made known to the Receiver; so that upon this construction of the resolution, the receivability of paper is to depend on a fact, and that fact is to be decided by a subordinate officer of the Government. The argument of the gentleman, however able, was too elaborate, too refined, to receive his assent. He had never believed that profound legal science was very necessary in construing a plain statute law; nor did he consider that men of eminent professional skill were always the safest expounders of written laws, whether statutes or constitutional provisions. Cicero said, in his day, that the lawyers had spoiled many excellent institutions by their refinements; and we all know, that in our own times, by their forced and strained constructions, they have mystified and perverted many plain and good laws, and bewildered the clearest minds. Whether we look to the language or the manifest object and purpose of the resolution of 1816, he thought there could be no difficulty in understanding it. We are told by legal writers, that in giving a construction to statutes, it is necessary to ascertain the general object of the law, the evils and mischiefs that existed, and which the act was designed to remove; and more especially is this said to be necessary, when the language of an act is doubtful or ambiguous.

What was the object of the resolution of 1816, and what were the evils it was intended to remedy? It is said that its object was to enlarge the rights of the debtors of the United States, and to enable them to pay their debts in a more convenient and easy manner. But does this appear on the face of the resolution? Is it inferable from its title? And if we look to the state of the Treasury, and the condition of the revenue at the time the resolution was adopted, we cannot fail to discover the evils which this resolution was intended to remedy. Instead of its object being to enlarge the rights of the debtors of the Government, it was designed to restrict them, and did restrict them. What was the condition of your Treasury at that period, and how was the revenue collected? There was then in the Treasury more than one million of dollars in the bills of broken banks; and the public revenue had been collected in the notes of banks which did not redeem them in specie; a large portion of the banks in the Union, which had suspended specie payments during the war, had not resumed them. This resolution expressly limited the Secretary so far as not to permit him to receive any bills of banks which did not redeem them with specie. He is expressly prohibited from receiving the notes of non-specie paying banks; and it was left optional with him to collect the public revenue, either in the lawful currency of the United States, or in Treasury notes, or in the notes of specie-paying banks. So far, a discretion was still left with the Secretary; but the discretion he had exercised of taking bills of banks which did not pay their notes in specie, was taken from him. These bills were received by the Bank of the United States only, as special deposits, and the loss was thrown upon the Treasury.

This resolution was only an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury; it has neither the form nor the language of a public act. The title shows clearly that the object of Congress was solely to secure the Treasury, and guard it against a loss from bad money. It is entitled, "A resolution relative to the more effectual collection of the public revenue." Can a mere instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the fiscal agent of the Government, change the rights or obligations of the debtors of the United States? Suppose a creditor should instruct his agent to receive payment for a debt in some other than the legal currency, or to take less than the sum due, or to receive payment in some kind of property—would this confer on the debtor the legal right to pay his debt, and discharge his liability in either of the ways specified? On a suit by the creditor could he avail himself of such instructions to vary the nature of his liability?

The construction here contended for, had always been given to the resolution of 1816; and the Senator from Massachusetts had, on former occasions, regarded it in the same light, as had been shown by the extracts read from his speech and report by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton.) It was a very extraordinary position attempted to be maintained, that for twenty years there had been a public law in force in the United States, conferring on paper money, or bank bills, the legal character of gold and silver, so far as regards the payment of the revenue and all debts due the United States, and that the country has been unapprized of the existence of such law. An act to legalize paper money, and make it a lawful tender for all debts to the United States, is one of great importance, and would have been likely to have excited general interest and attention.

The sixteenth section of the act chartering the Bank of the United States, provides that the deposits of the moneys of the United States shall be made in that bank and its branches. But the bank had refused to receive the bills of certain banks, notwithstanding they were redeemed in specie, and had been justified by Congress in so doing, in a report to that effect, drawn up by the Senator himself. But if the resolution of 1816 gave to the bills of State banks all the character of gold and silver, so far as regards dues to the Government, then such bills were the "money of the United States," and the bank was bound by its charter to receive them on deposit.

The Senator from Massachusetts referred to the fact, that the President last session sent a message to Congress, recommending the repeal of the fourteenth section of the charter of the Bank of the United States, which required that the notes of that bank should be received in all payments to the United States. He could not perceive what inference could be drawn from this fact, favorable to the gentleman's purpose; but it appeared to him that the necessary inference was directly the contrary. The bills of the Bank of the United States were made receivable by the Government, by a distinct provision in its charter; and the President wished that section repealed, which would place them on the same footing as other bank bills. But if the Senator is correct in his argument, it would have been of no use to repeal the fourteenth section of the bank charter, as the United States would still have been obliged to receive the bills of that bank, under the resolution of 1816. Moreover, the fourteenth section was never of any importance to the Bank of the United States, if, as is contended, the resolution of 1816 gave to the bills of all specie-paying banks the character of receivability for debts payable to the United States. The bills of the State banks, so far as regarded the Government, stood on the same footing as those of the Bank of the United States; although it has always been claimed that the privilege conferred by the fourteenth section, formed a part of the consideration, for which the corporation had paid a bonus of a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. President: if there is any doubt in regard to the legal import and effect of the resolution of 1816, still there can be no question as to the kind of currency which is receivable for the sales of the public lands. The fourth section of the act of 1820, which superseded the credit system, and required that sales should be made for cash payments, settles that question. The proviso to the fourth section is, "that no such lands shall be sold at any public sale hereby authorized, for a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents, nor on any other terms than cash payments." This section, it is true, is confined to lands forfeited to the United States; but its spirit and language are in perfect accordance with the other sections of the act. The clause "cash payments," must be understood in its ordinary acceptation, in which sense it does not mean Treasury notes, nor the notes of banks, but money, which is a legal tender by the laws of the United States. In the ordinary acceptation, "cash" signifies money, or that currency which is a lawful tender for debts. Any other construction would be to tifle with language, and an insult to common sense.

Mr. N. said, that without consuming more time on that point, he was satisfied that the objection to the Treasury order on the ground of its illegality, was entirely unfounded.

Mr. N. said he would now proceed to submit a few remarks on the other division of the subject. Has the Treasury order operated unjustly and injuriously to the interests of the country? Has it caused the embarrassments and pressure for money which have prevailed so extensively and disastrously throughout the country, and particularly in the large commercial cities? All these evils have been charged upon it, as the results of the derangement it has occasioned in the business and monetary concerns of the country. In regard to the discrimination or exception from its operation in behalf of actual settlers, and the citizens of the States in which lands were sold, as that exception had now ceased, he would not spend any time upon it.

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. Crittenden) asked, with an air of triumph, what had been the good effects of the order? Whilst its evils have been so manifest, and of such great magnitude, we have a right, said he, to call on its advocates to point out its benefits. Mr. N. said that in his preliminary remarks, he referred to what appeared to have been some of the beneficial effects of the order, and he would not repeat them. They were such too, he believed, as were contemplated by the Executive at the time the order was adopted. But as those who supported the resolution before the Senate took the affirmative of the issue, he might, perhaps, with more propriety, call on them to point out the evil consequences of the order. This they have attempted to do, but he thought with no very great success. It has been boldly asserted, that the Treasury order had deranged the currency, and occasioned the existing difficulties and pressure in regard to money, which he admitted to be very severe. This, sir, (said Mr. N.) is no new complaint against the present administration. It is the old story which has been so often repeated within the last few years, that its authors on the present occasion can lay no claims to originality. On his way to this city, during a short detention in New York, he had a conversation with a merchant, who complained not only of the times, but of the Government. It was, however, only a repetition of the old story, of tampering with the currency!—war upon the currency! When will the Government cease tampering with the currency? These complaints come with an ill grace from bankers, brokers, and merchants, who are strenuous supporters of that inflated system of paper money and credit, whose inherent defects are the source of the very evils which they denounce. Mr. N. said, that when he heard complaints like these, he was forcibly reminded of an anecdote of Dr. Franklin, who, when in Europe, was a member of a learned society, which had a regulation, that on certain occasions each member was to suggest some problem in physical science, and each one present was to give an explanation impromptu. The Doctor, who was fond of starting game for philosophers, as he called it, proposed this question: "How it was to be accounted for, that a barrel of fish would contain more salt than the barrel without the fish?" The explanations given by the learned savans, although extremely ingenious, did not appear to be entirely satisfactory. At last all eyes were turned towards the Doctor, who, it was supposed, could give a satisfactory solution of a problem he had suggested. "Gentlemen," said he, "in the first place the fact is not so." So in regard to the complaints of merchants and politicians, so often repeated, of tampering with the currency, it is a sufficient answer to say, the fact is not so. These charges are without foundation, even if we consider currency in the very comprehensive sense in which it appears to be regarded by the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) who, if he correctly understood him, appears to consider currency as comprehending not only bank bills, but bills of exchange, and every description of paper which was used to facilitate the transactions of commerce. This appeared to him to be altogether too comprehensive a view of the subject of currency, even in a commercial sense. It appeared to be confounding currency and credit, which he had supposed were essentially distinct. In the small book which every Senator has on his table, (containing the constitution of the United States,) is a much better definition: he there found, that "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Here we find what is the legal and constitutional currency of the United States. Gold and silver, either the coinage of the United States, or foreign coin, the value of which has been fixed and regulated by a law of Congress, constitute the only currency known to the constitution.

But in a commercial sense, or in the common acceptation, whatever circulates as money, and is received as such, in the ordinary transactions of society, may be considered as a part of the currency of the country; and in this view of the subject, bank bills form a part of our currency. But if we admit the bills of our banks to be a component part of the currency of the country, still the complaints, of which we have heard so much for some years past, are without any just foundation. What are the acts of this administration, which have been denounced as tampering with the currency, and making war on the currency? The first of them is the veto of the President, of the bill for rechartering the Bank of the United States. This may have been a bold measure, but great evils require powerful remedies; and it was confirmed and fully sustained by the people, and afterwards by Congress, which refused to give the bank another charter. If this measure had succeeded in destroying the Bank of the United States, it might be considered, in some measure, as interfering with the currency of the country, if it can be made out that the bills of that bank possessed any essential qualities as money, or currency, which do not pertain to the bills of the State banks. But he did not consider that the bills of that bank possessed any material advantages, as money, over those of the State banks; for such were its regulations, that the different branches, so far as respects the redemption of their bills, were so many independent banks. It was not necessary, however, to consider this question, because the bank had not ceased to exist. No, unfortunately for the country, the "monster" still lives; and, according to the declarations of its president, at the very time of its resuscitation, under a charter obtained from one of the States, it inherits a circulation of twenty-two millions, and a credit throughout the world. We have the word of its president that the bank still possesses its essential ability to do good, and, in the opinion of many, it has lost none of its powers of mischief. Whether for good or for evil, then, the bank still exists, and the country has the benefit, if such it is, of that paper currency which it can supply.

The next act which has been condemned as an act of war upon the currency, is the Treasury order for removing the public deposits in 1833. This, as is well known, occasioned great excitement; the measure was denounced in this Hall and elsewhere, as illegal, unconstitutional, and an alarming usurpation, calculated to derange the currency, destroy public and private credit, and prostrate the entire business of the country. Now the excitement has gone by, and the angry waves subsided, and the measure already become, in some sense, a matter of history, we can look back upon it dispassionately and calmly. And what was this alarming act of usurpation, this war upon the currency and credit of the country, which was to paralyze all the great interests of the nation? He did not speak with any reference to its legality or constitutionality, but solely with regard to its effect on the currency and credit. Why, sir, said Mr. N., this measure consisted simply of an order from the Secretary of the Treasury changing the place of deposit of the public revenue, at a time when the money in the Treasury amounted to but about nine millions of dollars. The measure related only to the money of the United States; it had no application whatever to the currency of the country, whether metallic or paper; it had no operation upon commerce, or duties, or importations. This act, which was said to derange the currency and destroy credit, was nothing more than the control and management of the funds belonging to the people of the United States, in no way interfering with the transactions of commerce, or currency, or credit. Cannot the Government take care of their own funds, and manage them as they think best, without being charged with making war on the currency? without an outcry from bankers, brokers, and merchants, that their business is injured, and the whole country exposed to ruin? Must the Secretary of the Treasury consult the bankers before he can decide on any measure in relation to the public funds? If an act, having no bearing on commerce, in no way directly affecting any of the interests of the country, and which merely changed the places of deposit of the public revenues, could have occasioned the serious consequences which were charged upon it—the derangement of the currency, prostration of credit, the wide spread embarrassments and distress which prevailed—the case would afford the strongest, the most irresistible argument against the whole paper credit system. If these consequences did follow from so small a cause, it proves the miserable, wretched condition of your paper currency, which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to consider as preferable to gold and silver.

Unstable and bad as he considered the paper currency of the country, he would make no such charge against it; he did not believe it could be deranged, and the whole country involved in difficulty and distress by so trifling a cause. No, sir, there was at that period a war upon the currency; but it did not come from the Executive, or the Government, but from the Bank of the United States, and other banks which from fear or favor co-operated with it in its measures intended to distress the country, and create a panic. That war on the currency and on the country came from the great mammoth of the paper system, which possessed more power over the currency than this Government—which could make paper money plenty or scarce, at its pleasure. At this day, he believed no one could be found who would maintain that the embarrassments and distress which prevailed during almost the entire year of 1834, were occasioned by the change which was made in the management of the public revenue.

Mr. N. said he now came to consider the last measure, which had been condemned as a tampering with the currency—the Treasury order of the 11th July—requiring cash payments for the public lands. It is claimed that the money pressure which has prevailed for months past, and which still continues, has been occasioned by this new regulation as to the sales of the public lands. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) did not seem to advance this opinion with confidence; he said there was a complication of causes; that this order, with other causes, had occasioned the existing difficulties; but when he came to point out the other causes, they did not appear to be very numerous or complicated, and all of them centered in the Executive Department of the Government. The complication of causes appeared to consist of but two; the Treasury order, and the execution of the deposit act, or the apprehension of the manner in which that act was to be executed. That the deposit act had contributed to increase the money pressure, Mr. N. did not doubt; but what properly belonged to the act, ought not to be charged to the execution, or the apprehended execution. He reluctantly gave his support to that act, although sensible at the time that it would increase, rather than relieve, the pressure for money, which prevailed. But it had not been shown that any censure was justly chargeable upon the Secretary for the execution of the law. It was impossible but that the act should occasion some temporary inconvenience in the monetary concerns of the country. It disposes of a large sum of money, nearly forty millions, upon principles altogether foreign to the commercial principles which control and regulate the moneyed capital of the country. Population is not the principle upon which commerce distributes money.

Mr. N. said that in relation to the Treasury order, he would not deny that in some small degree it may have increased the difficulties which exist. It had increased the demand for specie, and that was the principal object of the measure, to obtain something of real value for the public lands. Its operation has been to replenish the deposit banks in the west with specie funds, and to draw them from the banks at the east, which has, to some extent, diminished the ability of the latter to make loans. But a contraction of the paper currency had long before commenced; and that contraction must necessarily produce a curtailment in the loans and discounts of banks. The Treasury order only co-operated with other causes in producing results, which were inevitable. To regard the Treasury order as the efficient cause of the present crisis, would be like an attempt to find one's way by a taper, and close his eyes to the sun, which was enlightening the world. The real cause of the existing pressure is much broader and deeper than the Treasury order; it is a cause which is inherent in the banking system, and in that paper currency which we have just heard commended as preferable to gold and silver. There are laws which act upon and control the paper system of currency, supplied by banks, which are as immutable as those that govern the physical universe. One of these laws is, that a sudden expansion of the currency, even to an inconsiderable amount, gives an undue stimulus to enterprise, that occasions overtrading and speculation, which will continue to increase, until they are checked by a reaction in the money market, when a contraction of the currency ensues, by the banks being obliged to curtail their discounts. This occasions a scarcity of money.

But it seems to be denied that there has been any dangerous or essential enlargement of the paper currency. The Senator from Massachusetts admits that there has been a great augmentation of banking capital within the last two or three years, but attributes it to the rapid and unparalleled advance in the value of real estate and other property. It appeared to him this was taking the effect for the cause. What has occasioned the rapid rise in the price of real estate and other property? Is it not the flood of paper money with which the country has been inundated for the last few years, and the wide spread and extravagant speculations to which it has given rise? If that is not the cause, he would like to know what it was. Has there not been an alarming increase of bank capital, and of course of bank circulation, the last few years? The bank capital of the State banks was estimated by Mr. Gallatin, in 1830, at ninety-five millions of dollars, and the bank circulation at thirty-nine millions. The annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a year ago, contained returns from nearly all the State banks; according to which, the capital of the State banks, on the 1st of January, 1835, amounted to about ninety-six millions, and their circulation to about eighty-six millions. Since that period, the increase of bank capital has been astonishingly rapid. It is thought to have exceeded one hundred millions, and the circulation to have been increased fifty millions. But in addition to this, the Bank of the United States has been rechartered the year past, with a capital of thirty-five millions, and has the possession of seven millions belonging to the United States; making a capital of forty-two millions. During the past year, there has also been a sum of from thirty to forty millions of dollars of the public revenue in the deposit banks, which has been used for banking purposes, and constituted a part of their capital. The whole addition to the banking capital of the country, since January, 1835, must considerably exceed one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and the addition to the circulation fifty millions.

In his report, the present session, the Secretary estimates the circulation of bank paper, on the first of the present month, at one hundred and twenty millions; but thinks that in July it considerably exceeded that sum. Mr. N. thought this estimate below the truth, because it was found that the issues of banks, would bear a certain proportion to their capitals. If it was true, as was supposed by Adam Smith, who wrote at a time when the subject of banking was very imperfectly understood, that no more paper money could be circulated than would supply the specie which it forced out of circulation, the creation of banking capital would not add to the paper currency. But that principle is incorrect; the paper issues of banks are found to depend mainly on the capital which shall be employed in banking operations. What proportion the circulation will bear to the banking capital was not clearly established, but it would not vary far from thirty per cent. If gentlemen will look into the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, just laid on our tables, they will find that the deposit banks, with a capital of seventy-seven millions, have a circulation of forty-one millions, or more than fifty per cent. These banks, it is true, possess large sums in deposit, so that their circulation is, no doubt, considerably larger, in proportion to their capital, than the general average.

Sir, (said Mr. N.) are we to be told in the face of these strong facts, that there has been no undue enlargement of the paper currency and the credit system the last two years? Are we to believe that this increase has been occasioned by the general rise in the value of property? Has property advanced nearly fifty per cent. in two years? And if such was the fact, what reason can be assigned for such an unprecedented advance in the value of property in so short a period, except the superabundance of the paper currency?

That the flood of paper money, and the great extension of bank credits, were the original and efficient cause of the embarrassments and difficulties which had prevailed for nearly one year, was clear beyond any reasonable doubt. Even a very small addition to the currency excites to overtrading and speculation, and an advance of prices. This has been found to be invariably the case in England and in this country since the establishment of the Bank of the United States. All periods of excitement and speculation, in both countries, have been preceded by an increase of money or credit, or both. The year 1835 and the first half of the year 1836, have been distinguished for speculation in stocks, real estate and every kind of property, and for the unprecedented multiplication of joint stock companies, for almost every conceivable object. A reaction has ensued, and there is now great distress in that country for money, as well as in this. This spirit of speculation and gambling is there attributed to an expansion of the paper currency, although the increase of paper appears to be trifling, compared to what has taken place in this country. In 1833, there were but thirty-four joint stock banks in England, and in July, 1836, they had increased to seventy-seven. Their issues in 1834 were £1,783,600; and in 1836, £3,094,025, being an increase of less than a million and a half. In the meantime, the private banks had not increased, but to a small amount had contracted their issues. So small an addition to the paper currency as this is considered as the cause of the rage of speculation and gambling which has prevailed, and of the distress that has followed.

Mr. N. said that in support and corroboration of these views, he would ask the Secretary to read some short extracts from two recent writers in that country, which he had copied:

Extract from Mushet.

"In 1819, the Bank of England and the country banks curtailed their issues about 15 per cent. and consols fell about 14 per cent.; in 1820, the country banks curtailed 32 per cent. in 1821, 28 per cent. A fall of prices, and scarcity of money followed; and 1819, '20, and '21, were years of great distress in England. One of the great evils from the great fluctuation in the amount of the currency, is the spirit of gambling which it engenders. It is the sudden abundance of money, which is the main spring of all gambling transactions in our funds, and in articles of general consumption; and the rise in prices is forced by speculative buying and selling, considerably beyond the actual increase of the currency. It is to this cause alone, and under every circumstance, which, as a nation, we can be placed, that I attribute the whole of the speculations, now and heretofore, that have appeared to begin in prosperity, and to end in the distress and ruin of thousands.

The speculative rise probably exceeds the addition to the squares added. If 2 per cent. is added, prices will rise 8; if 8, thirty-two per cent. If, on the other hand, there is a contraction of 8 per cent. it will be attended with a fall of public credit and confidence in buying and selling. These are the evils, and they are evils of great magnitude, that attend the use of the paper currency. There is a range of contraction and expansion in the use of paper, that does not belong to a metallic currency, and which perhaps does more than counterbalance all the advantages to a nation from the use of paper."

Extract from the Edinburgh Review, Vol. 4, No. 2.

In a country so opulent as this, and so rapidly increasing in wealth and population, the two great ardors of speculation, and the miscalculation of producers, must necessarily sometimes occasion overtrading, and consequently gluts and depresses of the market. But were the currency in a perfectly sound state, the excitement arising from such causes would almost necessarily be confined to one or a very few businesses, and would be very far indeed from being either general or universal. In point of fact, all periods of general excitement, or periods marked by a general tendency to speculation, and by a general rise of prices, have both in this and other countries, been uniformly distinguished by some extraordinary facilities in obtaining supplies of money or of credit, or of both. We are bold to say, that no single instance to the contrary can be pointed out in the history of industry in modern times."

Mr. N. said, that the opinions of these two enlightened writers in pointing out the evils of a paper currency, contained a satisfactory explanation of the true origin of the pecuniary difficulties which now exist in this country. There was no Treasury order in England, no tampering with the currency, so far as the Government was concerned, yet the same evils had been experienced there.

A paper currency was, from the very nature of it, unstable, and subject to constant fluctuations. Such had been its character in England, and in this country particularly. Since the establishment of the late Bank of the United States, it had been still more unstable. Those who suppose that reactions and periods of distress were only occasional, and the result of extraordinary causes, were entirely mistaken. They are evils inherent in the system, and inseparable from it. Whoever will look back to the period of the establishment of the Bank of the United States, will find that such has been the case in this country. the severe and universal distress which prevailed throughout the Union in 1819 and '20, will long be remembered. In 1822, money again became scarce, and in 1825 there was great distress in the United States, as well as in England, where the pressure was universal and desolating in its consequences. So great was the calamity, that it was found necessary to take away, in part, the monopoly of the Bank of England, and authorize the establishment of joint stock banks, as a means of relief. In 1826, money was scarce in New York; and in the winter of 1827, '8, in the middle and eastern States. In 1829, many banks failed, and there was great distress among the manufacturers in the eastern States. In the latter part of 1832, money again became scarce; and nearly the entire year of 1834 was distinguished, not only for a pressure, but for a panic, unexampled in this country. The evils of this period are too fresh in the memory of every one, to render it necessary to enlarge upon them.

In confirmation of these facts and views, he would beg leave to read a letter which has been published; it is from no visionary theorist, or anti-bank man, but from a responsible officer, the cashier of the Branch of the United States Bank in Baltimore, in 1830, and was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. It bears date, February 15, 1830.

"Looking back to the peace, a short period, fresh in the memory of every man, the wretched state of the currency for the two succeeding years cannot be overlooked. The disasters of 1819, which seriously affected the circumstances, property and industry of every district in the United States, will long be recollected. A sudden and pressing scarcity of money prevailed in 1822; numerous and very extensive failures took place in New York, Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans, in 1825. There was a great convulsion among banks and other moneyed institutions, in 1826. The scarcity of money among traders in that State and eastward, in the winter of 1827-8, was distressing and alarming. Failures of banks in North Carolina and Rhode Island, and amongst the manufacturers of New England and this State (Maryland,) characterized the last year, (1829); and intelligence is just received of the refusal of some of the principal banks of Georgia to redeem their notes with specie—a lamentable and rapid succession of evil and untoward events, prejudicial to the progress of productive industry, and causing a baleful extension of embarrassment, insolvency, litigation and dishonesty, alike subversive of social happiness and morals. Every intelligent mind must express regret and astonishment, at the recurrence of these disasters in tranquil times and bountiful seasons, amongst an enlightened, industrious and enterprising people, comparatively free from taxation, unrestrained in their pursuits, possessing abundance of fertile lands and valuable minerals, with capital and capacity to improve, and an ardent disposition to avail themselves of, these great bounties.

"Calamities of an injurious and demoralizing nature, occurring with singular frequency amidst a profusion of the elements of wealth, are well calculated to inspire and enforce the conviction, that there is something radically erroneous in our monetary system, were it not that the judgment hesitates to yield assent, when grave, enlightened and patriotic Senators have deliberately announced to the public, in a recent report, that our system of money is in the main excellent, and that in most of its great principles no innovation can be made to advantage."

Mr. N. said that the letter which he had just read contained more truth and honesty than all the communications which had ever appeared from the head of that banking institution, of which the writer of this letter was an officer. It presented a faithful, but melancholy picture, of the operations of our banking and credit system.

With such facts as these, and the experience of the last twenty years before us, he thought it was trifling with common sense to talk about the Treasury order being the cause of the existing difficulties. Sir, (said Mr. N.) the cause of these evils lies deeper and broader; it exists in your paper currency and banking system. The order has, no doubt, in some small degree, contributed to increase the pressure; and this is also true of the deposit act. They have served to bring on the crisis a little sooner than it might otherwise have come, but the disease was upon us, and must have its course.

If we were to look to any secondary causes, that of a wild spirit of speculation stands pre-eminent; and particularly speculation in public lands. But speculation is stimulated by our system of currency and credit. The immense purchases of the public lands during the last two years have filled your Treasury to overflowing; more than forty millions had been received from the sales of the public domain. This immense capital had been withdrawn from its accustomed employment. This, of itself, was sufficient to derange the whole business of the country.

The period of distress to which he had particularly referred, was also distinguished by speculations in the public lands. They commenced in 1818; the sales that year exceeded seven millions of dollars; in 1819, they were more than seventeen millions, and the first two quarters of 1820 amounted to the enormous sum of twenty-seven millions. In July the law went into operation, requiring cash payments; and so entirely did the sales depend on credit, that they were almost entirely suspended, and the last half of that year amounted to only about four hundred thousand dollars; and for the four succeeding, did not average one million a year. Speculations in the public lands again commenced in 1834, when the sales amounted to about eight millions; in 1835, to fifteen millions, and the present year to more than twenty-four millions, including the sales of the Chickasaw lands, which do not go into the Treasury. That a reaction should follow this reckless spirit of speculation, was inevitable.

Mr. N. said he thought that the attempt to charge the embarrassments and pressure for money upon the Treasury order, had entirely failed. He believed the order to be legal, and was satisfied that it had had but little agency in causing the existing crisis. Still it was, in his mind, a question whether the principle of that order ought to be maintained. He considered it as a temporary measure, well calculated to remedy existing evils of the most alarming magnitude. But he was not prepared to say that it would do as a permanent regulation. The strongest reason for its adoption was to guard against the flood of paper money which was flowing with a swelling tide into the deposit banks from the sales of the public lands. This evil he hoped would be corrected by legislation before Congress adjourned, which, so far as that object was concerned, would supersede the Treasury order. But still the question is before us, and may have to be decided, in what currency shall the public revenue be collected? This was a question of great delicacy and magnitude. Great as he considered the evils of our paper system of money and credit, he did not see how this Government could provide a remedy. It certainly could not do it by any direct legislation; it had no power over the State banks, or their issues. The only power it could exercise upon the paper currency of the State banks was indirectly in the collection and disbursement of the revenue, and this was no small power, especially at a time like the present, when the revenues amounted to more than forty millions. A large portion of the whole currency of the country passes through your Treasury annually.

Mr. N. said he was not prepared to say to what extent this power could safely be exercised. He was satisfied, however, that it would not do at the time to collect the revenue in specie exclusively. Congress had no doubt a right to do this; but in the collection of so large an amount of revenue, we must have some regard to the business of the country, and to the ordinary currency used in commercial and other transactions. It is evident that we might adopt a rule which would occasion great inconvenience, and perhaps injustice, because the large sums of money received into the Treasury cannot well be collected in a currency not in general use. Whatever principle is adopted as a permanent regulation, ought to be uniform and applicable to the customs as well as the lands. That in the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, it will be proper to attempt to remedy some of the evils of the paper system, he had no doubt. We may by our regulations do something to increase the use and circulation of specie, and discountenance bills of small denominations. With regard to this important object, Congress had, perhaps, done all that it could by direct legislation. It has superseded the act of 1819, and legalized foreign coin; it has raised the standard of gold coin; it has established additional mints and greatly increased the annual coinage, and particularly that of gold, which has already become a new and important part of our metallic currency. The amount of specie in the country is greatly increased the last three years, for which this administration is entitled to great credit.

Mr. N. said that he could not assent to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, who, if he understood him, contended that it was the right and the duty of Congress to regulate the whole currency of the country. By this, he understood the Senator to mean, that Congress had the power to regulate the paper issues of the State banks. If he did not refer to this description of currency, it was difficult for him to conceive to what his remarks were intended to apply. But whilst we were so emphatically informed that this was the duty of Congress, we were not told how it was to be done. In what way can Congress regulate the paper currency supplied by the State banks? The gentleman did not inform us: he seemed to have a studied caution and reserve on this point, and thereby hangs a tale. Mr. N. thought, however, there was no secret in the case. The views of the Senator have been heretofore disclosed. Sir, said Mr. N. the Senator would regulate the paper currency of the States by a paper currency of the Federal Government; he would regulate the banking institutions of the States by the agency of a bank of the United States. This was the secret. A national bank is to be the regulating power. But the country thought the remedy worse than the disease; they had twice tried it, and knew what sort of a regulation it was. He was speaking of a national bank in a mere financial point of view, without any reference to constitutional or political objections; and in this aspect of the question, he did not hesitate to say that the proposition of establishing a national bank, as a means of restraining and regulating the State banks, was the most preposterous one ever submitted to a deliberative body and the boldest attempt ever yet made to practise, on the gullibility of the people. That such an institution possessed, and would necessarily exercise, great power over the State banks, he was not disposed to deny; but the question was, whether that power would be exercised for good or for evil. The question is not whether it is a regulator, but whether it is a safe regulator; whether it tends to keep the paper currency of the country more stable, or to render it more fluctuating. He appealed to the experience of the country in the last twenty years to settle that question. When the great national bank throws out its money plentifully, the State banks do the same; they are invited to this course, and it is their interest to pursue it. When it curtails its discounts and its issues, the State banks are compelled to do the same; so that the result of this mode of regulating the paper currency of the country, through the agency of a national bank, is, to place in the hands of a few individuals the power to make money plenty or scarce at their pleasure. The currency of the country is made to depend on the interest, the caprice, or the passions, of one or more individuals. This is a power greater than that possessed by your Executive; and its terrible effects were experienced during the memorable year of the panic.

Mr. N. said that the present high prices of provisions and the necessities of life were supposed to be inconsistent with the existing scarcity of money. There was nothing, however, extraordinary in this state of things; it was the case in 1819. The reaction was felt first upon stocks, and these kinds of property which had a more intimate connection with the money market; whilst the products of labor were less easily or immediately affected. When the prices of the necessities of life are once raised, by an undue expansion of currency, and credit, and consequent speculation, it takes a long time, often years, to bring them down. Labor is the last thing that is raised in price; but when it is, all the products of labor will of course be advanced, and may remain high for years; but the reaction which is going on must bring them down to their proper value.

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. Ewing) has given a very novel explanation of the present high price of breadstuffs. He says that this country will no longer export wheat or flour, that there is but a small belt of three or four degrees of latitude, suitable for grain, and that from the establishment of manufactures, the demand at home is greatly increased; so that hereafter we can do no more than supply the domestic demand. We are told, also, that Europe is a great grain country. But the Senator seems to overlook the great and important fact of the difference in the population of the two continents. The whole population of the United States is less than that of the British Isles, which for several years have supplied the entire breadstuffs for their whole population. At the time of the union, in 1750, England and Scotland had a population of seven millions and a half, and the agriculture of the country produced barely a supply of grain equal to the consumption; and since that time the population had more than doubled, yet the last two or three years no wheat had been imported. The production, by the improvement of agriculture, had increased considerably above one hundred per cent. and to what extent it might be increased, remained to be known. Comparing this country to England, he did not doubt that its resources for grain, when properly developed, would be found sufficient to sustain a population of two hundred millions. The Senator's own State and one adjoining, could produce grain sufficient for the present population of the whole Union.

Mr. N. said he would conclude what he had to say, by noticing one observation of the Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing.) That Senator did not seem to be satisfied with condemning the Treasury order as unconstitutional and illegal, and as the cause of the distress which has prevailed; but he seemed to think it necessary to assail the motives of its authors. He more than insinuated that the measure did not originate with the President or the Secretary of the Treasury. He seemed to allude to a power behind the throne, greater than the throne itself; but with whom that power existed, we were not informed. He expected every moment to hear that it was the "Kitchen Cabinet;" but the Senator had not expressly alluded to that famous council, which once exercised such potent influence over public affairs.

He thought that common justice required that the motives of the President should have been spared. This, however, had not been done. The Senator appeared to think that there was some wicked motive in the Treasury order; that the object of its authors was, not what it imported, or what had been assigned. He says, the real object was to create embarrassment and distress throughout the country, and to charge the same to the operation of the deposit act of last session, and thereby render that measure unpopular with the people. This was the deep laid plot which the Senator has discovered. Mr. N. said he would only say, in reply, that if any such purpose had any influence on the issuing of the Treasury order, it was the silliest scheme that ever originated from the faculty of man. It could not be supposed that the act of last session was to be repealed, and, of course, there could be no other object but to render the principle of distribution unpopular. Sir, said Mr. N. the opponents of that principle do not desire the aid of any stratagem or artifice; they will not even take advantage of the embarrassments and difficulties which the execution of that law has occasioned. These were temporary evils; they were foreseen at the time. He was one, and perhaps the last, who had come into the support of that measure; but he did it with the full belief that its immediate effect would be to increase the existing difficulties. In supporting the act, he did not consider that he sanctioned the principle of distribution. Had the Senate then been told, as it had now, by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) that in passing that act, they would establish the principle of distributing surpluses from year to year, the bill could not have passed the Senate. Deeply and forcibly, as many of us felt the condition of your Treasury; unwilling as we were that forty millions of the public money should remain, for several years at least, in the deposit banks, to be used as a capital, multiplying all the evils of our inflated paper system; anxiously and deeply as we were impressed with these evils, we should not have entertained even a thought of relieving the country from them, by sanctioning the principle of distribution. No, (said Mr. N.) that principle has not yet received the sanction of this body; but, it seems, it is to be pressed upon us the present session, and, he trusted the opponents of the measure would be prepared to meet it, here and elsewhere, before the tribunal of public sentiment, where all questions affecting the great interests of the country and the safety of our institutions must ultimately come, and where the decision is not only final, but always safe, and usually correct. The opponents of this scheme want no extrinsic circumstances, or even temporary considerations, to bear on the question; all they ask is, to meet the principle in free, open, and fair discussion, upon its own intrinsic merits. If it is a sound and safe principle, in accordance with the constitution, consistent with the rights of the States, and conducive to the general prosperity, it will doubtless be sustained; but if it shall appear to be in conflict with the spirit of the constitution, fraught with mischief, tending to corruption, and dangerous to the rights and independence of the States, it could not stand, either here or before the popular tribunal of the country.

Mr. N. said he had concluded what he had to say, and had detained the Senate much longer than he intended.

REMARKS OF MR. RIVES, OF VIRGINIA.

In Senate, Dec. 22, 1836—on introducing his substitute for Mr. Ewing's resolution to rescind the Treasury order.

MR. RIVES said, he thought the observations just made by his friend from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) showed conclusively that there were insuperable objections to the adoption of the resolution proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio, (Mr. Ewing,) for rescinding the Treasury order of 11th July last. In the first place, the form of the proceeding was altogether unusual and inappropriate. It proposed to rescind an Executive act. But the business of Congress was not to invalidate or to confirm Executive acts, but to pass laws; or, in other words, establish rules operating in futuro, to which executive action would thereafter conform. The action of the legislative authority ought to be original, independent, and prospective, and to bear on its face no reference to the acts of any other department.

Indeed it is difficult to conceive what reason there can be for giving the particular form proposed to the action of Congress in this case, unless it be to imply a censure on the act to be rescinded. But however unprepared I may be, at present, (said Mr. R.) to make the provisions of the Treasury circular the permanent policy of the Government, I will not concur in any proceeding which shall cast a censure on the Executive for issuing it. Whatever may have been, or may still be, its actual operation, (and on this point the diversity of testimony and opinion among those far better informed than I have any means of being is so great, as to render any judgment I might be able to form of but little weight,) of one thing I am well persuaded, that the motives which induced the Chief Magistrate to direct it to be issued, were of the most honorable and patriotic character. I must say, also, that notwithstanding the ability and talent displayed on this, as on all other occasions, by the learned Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) he has not, in my humble judgment, succeeded in establishing any want of legality in the measure adopted by the Executive. Whatever rule, therefore, Congress may deem it necessary and expedient to establish for the future collection of the public revenue, I shall, for one, be opposed to any mode of action on the subject, which shall imply a censure for the past.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut (Mr. Niles) has, in my judgment, presented the Executive order of July last in its true light, as a temporary and occasional act, growing out of an extraordinary state of things then existing. It was designed to meet that state of things, and may have been wise and salutary as a temporary act, to operate until the meeting of Congress, while its continuance as a permanent legislative rule would be inexpedient. The President himself evidently regards it in this light. In his message at the commencement of the session, he submits the whole subject for the consideration of Congress, and while he recommends to them earnestly the adoption of some measure for limiting the sales of the public lands, he attaches but little importance to the future requisition of specie in payments for them. Now, sir, I beg leave to say in advance, that any practicable and equal measure, which shall be digested by the gentlemen of the west, to prevent the great evil of a monopoly of the public domain in the hands of speculators, shall meet with my hearty concurrence. A bill for that purpose is already before us, and without having examined, or being prepared to express an opinion of, its details, I hope I will receive the prompt consideration and action of Congress.

But to return to the Treasury order. The President has done what he deemed his duty, under the peculiar and extraordinary circumstances of the emergency. We are now called upon to perform ours, in establishing some definite and permanent rule for the future collection of the revenue. An indispensable characteristic of any permanent system must be its uniformity. The genius of our institutions demands equality in the laws, and especially in the fiscal operations of the Government. It does not allow, as a permanent regulation, that specie shall be required in payment of one branch of the revenue, while bank notes are received for another—that one rule of collection shall prevail in the west, and another in the east. Whatever medium of payment, therefore, Congress shall prescribe for one portion of the public dues, ought to be extended to every other.

Shall that medium in public receipts and disbursements be specie exclusively? Even if this should be the ultimate policy of the Government, the country is, in my opinion, not yet ripe for its adoption. Specie must first diffuse itself more generally through the ordinary business of society,—the common channels of circulation must be better filled with the metallic currency,—before the Government can, with justice to the public debtor, sternly demand payment of its dues in gold and silver exclusively. The only effectual means by which a larger circulation of gold and silver in the general trade and business of the community can be obtained, is the suppression of bank notes of the smaller denominations. This is that practical reform of the currency, which has been held steadily in view by the present administration and its friends; and in preparing for which, much has already been accomplished in the important steps of putting down the Bank of the United States, correcting by law the undervaluation of the gold coins, in the largely increased coinage and importation of both gold and silver, in the salutary influence exerted by the Treasury, through the collection and disbursement of the public revenue, over the leading State banks, and in the enlightened policy adopted by a majority of the States, in beginning a suppression of the smaller notes. It can be carried fully into execution only by a continued co-operation of the General and State Governments in the same sound and practical views. Like every other great reform, it must be gradual and progressive. In unduly precipitating the process, there will be danger of inauspicious reactions; and in the view of the great body of the community, whose material interests are always liable to be bruised and shocked by sudden and violent changes, the remedy might unfortunately come to be looked upon as worse than the disease.

While, therefore, I would steadily persevere in the wise policy of enlarging the specie circulation of the country, (the first efficient commencement of which has been made under the present administration,) I would carefully abstain from compromising the success of so important a reform by any premature or precipitate experiment, which might endanger a reaction. The present occasion may, with great propriety, be embraced, to make another safe advance in the prosecution of that reform, by laying a restriction on the receipt, in public collections, of the notes of all banks issuing bills under certain denominations. The joint resolution of 1816 ought to be remodelled, and adapted to the present condition of things. Some of its provisions have become obsolete. Of the four media of payment, in the collection of the public dues, recognised by it, two no longer exist, to wit: Treasury notes, and notes of the Bank of the United States, as a national currency. Of the remaining two, specie, and the notes of specie-paying banks, the latter ought, in my opinion, to be subjected to additional restrictions, especially such as may have a tendency to promote the great practical reform of a suppression of the small notes. But, while the notes of specie-paying banks are treated by all the world, in private transactions, as equivalent to specie, I do not think the Government would be justified in refusing them in public collections altogether, until gold and silver shall, by the previous suppression of small notes, have taken the place more generally of a paper currency.

What has appeared to me best to be done, under existing circumstances, is a revision and modification of the joint resolution of 1816, adapting it to the present condition of things, and providing that all sums of money accruing to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, or otherwise, shall be received only in gold and silver, or in the notes of banks paid on demand in gold and silver, but with the following restriction as to such notes, with a view to encourage the disuse and suppression of the smaller bank issues, and thereby enlarge the specie circulation; that is, from the passage of the law, no notes to be received in public collections of any bank, though a specie paying bank, which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and the like prohibition to be gradually extended, (allowing due time for the change,) first to the paper of banks issuing bills of a less denomination than ten dollars; and finally, to that of banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. I would add also this farther limitation; that not even the notes of specie paying banks of the above descriptions should be received, unless they were such as the banks in which they were to be deposited, should agree to pass to the credit of the United States as cash; obtaining thus a double guarantee for the soundness and safety of the public collections, and making the whole transaction, to every practical purpose, equivalent to a payment in specie.

A measure of this kind would, in my opinion, best satisfy the exigencies of all the public interests involved, whether of the revenue, the currency, or the general business of the community, and would conform to the sense of the country at large. I have drawn up, Mr. President, a resolution, founded upon and embodying these views; but I am embarrassed by a question of order, in placing it regularly before the Senate at the present moment. I will, however, take the liberty of reading it to the Senate, and will cheerfully conform to any suggestion which may be made as to the best manner of disposing of it.

[The call of the ayes and noes on the second reading of Mr. Lwin's resolution was then withdrawn, and it was passed to a third reading by general consent, in order to admit a motion to amend; and it being then allowable to offer an amendment, Mr. Rives moved to amend it by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting in lieu of it his own resolution, as follows:—

Resolved, That hereafter all sums of money accruing or becoming payable to the United States, whether for customs, public lands, taxes, debts, or otherwise, shall be collected and paid only in the legal currency of the United States, or in the notes of banks which are payable and paid on demand in the said legal currency, under the following restrictions and conditions in regard to such notes; that is, from and after the passage of this resolution, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than five dollars, shall be received in payment of the public dues; from and after the first day of July, 1839, the notes of no bank which shall issue bills or notes of a less denomination than ten dollars, shall be receivable; and from and after the 1st of July, 1841, the like prohibition shall be extended to the notes of all banks issuing bills or notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars; but the public debtors shall have the option of paying either in the said legal currency, or in the notes of banks of the description above mentioned, in good credit; provided, however, that no notes shall be taken in payment by the collectors or receivers, which the banks in which they are to be deposited shall not be willing to pass to the credit of the United States as cash.

REMARKS OF MR. REYNOLDS, OF ILLINOIS,

In the House of Representatives, 22d of December, 1836.—On his presentation of the following preamble and resolutions on the subject of the National road, he addressed the House as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry that I am compelled, by a sense of duty, to address the House on this subject, which, I fear, is not very interesting to my friends, the members of this House; and I can not promise them in my remarks, any thing like eloquence or oratory, that will be entertaining to them.

This is a subject of great interest and importance to the whole State of Illinois, and particularly to the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor. Its interest to the people, is the reason I now address you.

The preamble and resolution now under consideration, were adopted by the General Assembly of the State by a unanimous vote.

The State has assumed the principles and doctrines of State rights, which, I consider, are constitutional and correct, and such as can be maintained and demonstrated on a proper exposition of the constitution of our Government.

Without further comment or preface, I will read the preamble and resolutions which passed the Legislature of the State of Illinois by a unanimous vote:

"Whereas, it is the opinion of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, now in session, that the route which the National road should pursue, if extended so as to cross the Mississippi river at the town of Alton, would be in entire accordance with its ultimate destination, the capital of the State of Missouri; would be more advantageous to the commercial and agricultural interests of this State, and afford to her inhabitants, and those of her sister States, a more direct and convenient chain of intercommunication than any other route; and whereas, the passage of said road across the Mississippi river at St. Louis would not only be highly detrimental to the prosperity of this State, but in violation of her just pretensions and of her rights of sovereignty, contrary to the avowed policy of the General Government, and in open defiance of those principles of even-handed justice and impartiality which have characterized her dealings with other States, in relation to this matter:

Therefore, be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That the consent of the State of Illinois is hereby given to the Federal Government, to extend the National road through the territory of said State, so as to cross the Mississippi river at the town of Alton in said State, and at no other point.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best exertions to procure the passage of a law authorizing the survey of the route from Vandalia to Jefferson city, by the way of Alton, and for the continuation of the National road upon said route."

It will be perceived, by every member of this House, that this resolution presents a subject of much importance, and one on which various opinions have been entertained.

This subject being now and of difficult solution, I have the same pleasure in presenting it to this learned and intelligent assembly, as the es-lebrated personage of antiquity had in defending himself before King Agrippa. St. Paul said, that he was "happy to have the privilege to address a judge who was learned in all the laws and customs of the Jews." So do "I think myself happy" to have the honor to present this subject before an assembly that are intelligent, and learned in the laws and constitution of their country.

It is a principle, acknowledged by all constitutional lawyers and constitutional writers, that the Congress of the United States possess no power of action further than is expressly given them by the constitution; and on an attentive and careful examination of that instrument, it will be found that there exists no power in Congress to force on a State such improvements as are contemplated by this National road.

I would ask any gentleman in this House, if he would vote for an improvement of the country, such as the National road is, contrary to the express will and consent of the State in which the road was to be located? I do not believe there can be a case found in the history of this Government, where the General Government has forced on a State, contrary to the will and consent of the State, a road, or any such improvement.

The United States possess the power to make all necessary roads for her military operations. This power arises from her exclusive and constitutional authority over the subject of war and all its consequences.

The National road which is now under consideration is not pretended to be a military road, or in any manner connected with the military operations of the Government. The Constitution of the United States expressly authorizes Congress "to establish post offices and post roads." Congress, having the constitutional authority and jurisdiction over this subject, must, as a necessary consequence, have the power to "establish" post routes or post roads. The Congress, at their last session, established a great many post roads all over the Union. This is the establishment which, in my opinion, is contemplated by the Constitution, and not the making of a road, such as the National road is.

It would not be seriously contended by any one, that, under the provisions of the constitution on this subject, Congress would be bound, or would have the constitutional competency, to make and cut out a road wherever they establish post route.

The National road is, in fact, no more a post road than it is a military road; and, consequently, the General Government under the provisions of the constitution have no power to force it on the States.

If Congress possess the power, without the consent of the States through which this road passes, to make and open it in the States, then it must follow, as a matter of necessity, that Congress also possess the power to keep these roads in repair; and, in order to do this, they must establish toll-gates and toll-collectors on them. They must also possess the jurisdiction and control over them; and, consequently, must establish courts, and appoint officers, to enforce the acts of Congress, in the exercise of their jurisdiction over them. If Congress have the power, without the consent of the States, to make these roads, they must exercise all the jurisdiction and power above enumerated, in exclusion of the State authorities. This must be the necessary consequence, if they have the power, in the first instance, to make the roads.

I believe that there is no American citizen who would be willing to see the United States assume and exercise the exclusive jurisdiction and control over these national improvements, and deprive the States of their constitutional sovereignty and rights within the limits of their own territory.

I have heard intelligent gentlemen contend, that if the United States had the power to make the National road at all, they would have it as well without, as with, the consent of the States through which the road may pass. I consider this position to be without foundation and untenable.

A State has the power and right to admit any individual, or set of men, to expend their money in the State in such way or manner as the State may think proper and right. We see companies frequently incorporated by State authority to make roads, canals, and such improvements. They act under the authority of the State. They may be considered the agents or servants of the State, as they act under the control and laws of the State, and not by their own authority.

In the same manner, when the State gives her consent to the General Government to make a road within the limits of the State, the United States acts not by its own authority, but by the power and authority delegated to it by the State Government. The General Government act under the authority of the State, and like all other agents can not transcend the power given.

This view of the subject is demonstrated by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Maryland, passed in November, 1802, which is in the following words, to wit:

"That this State do hereby give and grant their full approbation and consent, that the Congress of the United States may appropriate, towards repairing, and keeping in repair, the post roads, or any one or more of them, within this State, such sum or sums of money as they in their wisdom may deem right, and to lay out and apply the same to said purpose in any manner they, by law, direct: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or may be construed to extend, to authorize Congress to pass any law for the changing the direction of the roads, or any of them, as now established, or to authorize them to pass a law for the opening of a new road."

The above recited act gives a construction to the constitutional power of Congress, and demonstrates the position, that Congress is governed in its action on this subject by the authority of the State Government.

This view of the subject is also fortified by Congress, transferring the National road to the States east of the Ohio, through which the road passes. Congress, by this act, disclaims the jurisdiction and exclusive control over this road, and transfers all her claim to it to the respective States in which it is located.

This is an acknowledgment that the General Government had not the power or jurisdiction over this improvement to the exclusion of the State Governments.

It is a principle, acknowledged by all, that the construction and exposition given to a law, or to a constitution, at or near the time the law or constitution was made, is of greater force and validity than a construction given at any other time.

In eighteen hundred and six, which is not a great length of time after the Constitution of the United States was adopted, an act of Congress passed on this very subject, and gave a construction to that instrument. This is the first act which was passed on the subject, and it is the act that established the Cumberland or National road.

I will read to you, Mr. Speaker, a part of the act of Congress which requires the President of the United States to obtain the consent of the States through which this road was to be located.

Commissioners were to be appointed by this act; and on their report, the duty of the President is prescribed in the following act of Congress, to wit:

"Which report the President is hereby authorized to accept or reject, in the whole or in part. If he accepts, he is hereby further authorized and requested to pursue such measures, as in his opinion shall be proper, to obtain consent, for making the road, of the State or States through which the same has been laid out; which consent being obtained, he is further authorized to take prompt and effectual measures to cause said road to be made through the whole distance, or in any part or parts of the same he shall judge most conducive to the public good, having reference to the sum appropriated for the purpose."

In the execution of the above recited act of Congress, and in the performance of his duty under it, President Jefferson addressed the following message to Congress:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: In execution of the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," I appointed Thomas Moore, of Maryland, Joseph Kerr, of Ohio, and Eli Williams, of Maryland, commissioners to lay out the said road, and to perform the other duties assigned to them by the act. The progress which they made in the execution of the work, during the last session, will appear in their report now communicated to Congress. On the receipt of it, I took measures to obtain consent for making the road, of the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, through which the commissioners proposed to lay it out. I have received acts of the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia, giving the consent desired; that of Pennsylvania has the subject still under consideration, as is supposed. Until I receive full consent to a free choice of route through the whole distance, I have thought it safest neither to accept, nor reject, finally, the partial report of the commissioners. Some matters suggested in the report belong exclusively to the Legislature.

TH. JEFFERSON.

"January 31st, 1807."

It is almost useless to observe, that no person ever stood higher for splendid talents, and for a complete and perfect knowledge of our constitution, and the nature of our Government, than President Jefferson did; and he deemed it necessary to have the "full consent" of the States "to a free choice of the route, through" "the whole distance," before he could cause the road to be made.

Mr. Speaker: I will trouble the House with only a few of the acts of the State Governments in which this road was located.

The following is an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, which passed 4th January, 1807, and fully recognises the principle, that the General Government has no power to make the improvement without the "consent" of the State.

"Whereas, a law passed the Congress of the United States on the twenty-ninth of March, 1806, directing the laying out of a road from Cumberland, on the Potomac river, to the Ohio; and the consent of this State being necessary to the opening of the same so far as it may run within her limits, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That it shall be lawful, and the full and entire consent of the State of Maryland is hereby given to the opening and improving the same; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause the said road to be laid out, opened, and improved in such way and manner as by the before recited act of Congress is required and directed."

An act passed the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania on the 9th April, 1807, on this subject, and is as follows, to wit:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, to cause so much of the said road as will be in this State, to be opened so far as it may be necessary the same should pass through this State, and to cause the said road to be made, regulated, and completed within the limits, and according to the intent and meaning of the before recited act of Congress in relation thereto."

Mr. Speaker: I will not trouble the House by reading any of the acts or resolutions of the General Assemblies of the States of Virginia, Ohio, or Indiana, through which this road passes. It will be found, on examination, that the consent of all the States, from one end of this road to the other, has been given to the General Government to construct the road, before the United States commenced it.

It seems to me there cannot exist a doubt in the mind of any one that will examine the subject attentively, and see the course of the General Government and of the States also on this subject, that Congress has not the constitutional power to force an improvement of this character on any State.

If Congress assume this power and exercise it, State rights and State sovereignty might be prostrated. If Congress can force a road on a State four rods wide, it can force into a State one of forty miles wide, and must of necessity exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it. This would be unreasonable, and destructive to our system of Governments. It would have a tendency to the formation of a consolidated Government, which would destroy State rights and State Governments.

The President, in his late message of December, 1836, recognises this principle where he says that "The great struggle was began against that latitudinarian construction of the constitution, which authorises the unlimited appropriation of the revenue of the Union to internal improvement within the States; tending to invest in the hands, and place under the control, of the General Government, all the principal roads and canals of the country, in violation of State rights, and in derogation of State authority."

This principle being demonstrated, that Congress has no power to make these works without the "consent" of the State in which they are located, the necessary consequence is—growing out of the above resolution—that the National road must cross the Mississippi river at Alton, in the State of Illinois. If the road does not cross the river at Alton, the consent of the State is given to locate it "at no other point."

It is proper and right to mention, that there is a contest between the States of Illinois and Missouri about the location of this road. The State of Illinois, as I have before remarked, is unanimous in her resolution to locate it at Alton; and the representatives of the people of Missouri wish it located so as to cross the Mississippi at St. Louis, in that State.

The people of Illinois entertain no unfriendly feelings towards the State of Missouri or the city of St. Louis. We are proud of the growth and prosperity of the State and of their city, but we are not so friendly to them as to advance their interests to the disparagement and destruction of our own rights and interests. We do "not love Cæsar less, but Rome more."

We, the people of Illinois, consider it our duty to advance our own happiness and interest, when it is not to do an injury or wrong to the State of Missouri or to the United States. We do not wish to injure St. Louis, but we are anxious to advance our own State and Alton.

At a recent election, under a statute law of the State of Illinois, a vote was taken for the location of the seat of Government of the State, and Alton received more votes than any other place; by which proceeding, it is almost certain, that Alton will become the seat of Government for the States and as the policy of the States through which the national road passes, and that also of the General Government, is to locate it, so as to pass the seats of the State Governments, this policy will, I hope, be extended to Illinois, as well as to other States.

Alton is one of the most flourishing and commercial towns in the State of Illinois. I am informed that it and its environs contain a population of four or five thousand souls; and I know it is rapidly increasing in population, business, and importance.

And although Alton may not contain as great a population as St. Louis, yet there is in the State of Illinois an immense number of people more than in the State of Missouri, which ought to be a strong argument in favor of the State of Illinois.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost unnecessary for me to state to this House at this time, that the National road has been located no farther west than to Vandalia, the seat of Government of the State of Illinois; and the resolution before us gives the consent of the State to continue it in that State to Alton, towards its ultimate destination, Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri; and, judging from the best information I can obtain, the route by Alton from Vandalia to Jefferson city, will be found on actual survey, to be the best and shortest, for the continuation of the road.

If this resolution gave the consent of the State to cross the Mississippi river at a point entirely out of the direction from Vandalia to Jefferson city, then I would say it was unreasonable, and ought not to be urged on the consideration of this House. On such occasion, I should regret to find myself advocating a course of policy so absurd and unjust. But when I am clearly satisfied that the route by Alton is the nearest and best from Vandalia to Jefferson city, and that the General Government will take into consideration the will, interest and "consent" of the State, in the location of this road, I feel a conscious rectitude in my course, and will pursue it, "uncaring of consequences."

I consider it my duty to pursue this course at this session of Congress, in conformity to the resolution of the General Assembly, and in accordance to the voice of the people, expressed in a meeting had on the occasion. The proceedings of this meeting were printed and laid on the table of each member.

Having finished my remarks on this resolution, I move to refer it to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

DEFERRED DEBATE ON THE SUBJECT OF THE UNEXPENDED BALANCES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

IN SENATE, DECEMBER 28.

Mr. BENTON rose to move the printing of the document from the Treasury Department, which had been called for on his motion, and had come in a few days ago. It was a document showing the unexpended balances of appropriations which would remain in the Treasury on the first day of January next, the amount of each balance, the object to which it was applicable, and the date of the law by which the appropriation was made. It was the amplification and substantiation of that part of the President's message at the commencement of the session, in which he said that these unexpended balances were estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, and which are outstanding appropriations, to be met by reimbursements from the States, if the revenue fell short of meeting them; and that this large amount unexpended was the effect of the lateness of the period at which the appropriations had been made. This fourteen and a half millions has been called a surplus, for which the Government has no use; and it would seem that some States, acting on this idea, were for treating the deposit act as a distribution law, and using the money deposited with them, as if the Government in reality had no use for it. Nothing (he said) could be more erroneous than this idea. This fourteen and a half millions were not a surplus, but appropriated money—appropriated too late to be used this year, but remaining applicable to its objects, under the act of 1795, for two full years after the year in which the appropriation was made. The document contains a detailed statement of each object, and in the list would be found objects belonging to every branch of the public service; and every State would find some objects near and dear to itself, and for which the State had been long soliciting. Among these objects, were the branch mints in the south and in New Orleans, the custom-houses in Boston and New York, the Treasury and Patent offices in this city, many fortifications, roads and block houses west of Missouri and Arkansas, half a dozen Indian tribes, and among them the Cherokee treaty, on which alone, the balance was $4,245,000. This latter was a good specimen of the whole of these delayed appropriations, and illustrated the manner practised at the last session to create an unavoidable surplus. First, the ratification of the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible exertions made to defeat it; then the appropriation law under the treaty was kept off to the last possible moment, and then all possible efforts made to defeat it. Finally, on the 2d day of July, the appropriation passed; and then Mr. John Ross, a true coadjutor of the surplus party, went home to prevent the Indians from receiving the money; and succeeded; and so saved this four millions and a quarter for distribution, as a part of that unavoidable surplus for which the States are told, and even Georgia herself is told, the Federal Government has no use for! Now there was some use for this four and a quarter millions. The United States would have to raise it otherwise, if she did not get it back from the States; for the compact with Georgia, made thirty-four years ago, and by which the United States obtained Alabama and Mississippi, will have to be carried into effect. And so of every object mentioned in the document. There were above two hundred of these objects, and money would have to be provided for carrying each of them into effect; for they were not of a nature to be abandoned; and this head of mine, (said Mr. B. putting his finger to his forehead,) this head of mine, as belonging to a member of the Finance Committee, was now occupied with this subject, and was considering how far duties could be reduced, and how far they would have to be kept up, and what tax otherwise unnecessary must be retained to supply the place of these fourteen and a half millions, if the deposit act is perverted by any of the States into a distribution law. Now, he wanted his fact carried home to the people of the States in such form that it could not be disputed. He would, therefore, move to have this document printed, and five copies sent to the Governor of each State, ten copies sent to each branch of the State Legislatures, and 1000 extra copies be supplied to the Senate for its distribution.

Mr. CALHOUN rose to make a very few remarks on the very extraordinary motion of the Senator from Missouri, and to ask for the yeas and nays on the question. The sending out this paper in the manner proposed, would make an erroneous impression on the minds of those to whom it would be sent, and would be an unusual departure from the ordinary practice of the Senate. Did not every Senator know that there was a large amount left in the Treasury, say five millions of dollars, by the deposit law of the last session, for the purpose of meeting these balances? Did not every Senator know that by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there were three millions of dollars of these appropriations that would not be wanted, and were therefore transferred to the surplus fund in pursuance of a standing law? And was there not besides, a large sum in the hands of the disbursing officers of the Government? He knew (Mr. C. said) that every exertion would be made in order to defeat the deposit bill at this session. He knew well that the battle was yet to be fought—a battle in which the people would be on one side, and the office holders and office seekers on the other. While up, he would refer to the Committee on Finance, and make one remark in reference to the report of that committee on the bill introduced by him a few days since, and much against his wishes referred to them. They had reported against the bill, and it was not strange that they should do so, because a majority of that committee were three out of the six who voted against the deposit bill at the last session. But what he complained of was, that they had reported it without one single word of explanation; the chairman simply saying that he was instructed by the committee to move for its indefinite postponement. He would now ask the chairman on what grounds he had reported against this bill? Was it because the committee were satisfied that there would not be a surplus? If so, (said Mr. C.) let us know it. I shall be glad to hear that such was their reason, because it is a debatable proposition. Was it because they would not have the surplus deposited with the States? If this was the case, it was directly contrary to the known sense of that body expressed almost unanimously at the last session. He could scarcely believe that the committee reported against the bill on such grounds. With the denunciations of the President himself against the corrupting influence of a large surplus in the Treasury, and his declarations that the worst disposition that could be made of it was to let it remain in the deposit banks, he did suppose that the committee could not contemplate either result. He could not believe but that, from courtesy, the chairman would make such a report as would put the Senate in possession of the grounds on which the committee objected to the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that this was not a more distant call than he had had on different occasions from the gentleman from South Carolina, for explanations in regard to subjects which had come under the consideration of the committee of which he (Mr. Wright) was an humble member. It would save the Senate some time, if subjects were debated when they were under consideration before the Senate, and not incidentally and collaterally. For his own part, he should be willing to answer any questions, after a subject should have been before the committee, and come up for debate, in the best manner he was able. But, he should not hold himself bound, at the call of any Senator, to enter upon a debate on the merits of any proposition not before the body, although it may have been reported upon by the committee. When the honorable Senator's bill should come before the Senate, then he would hold himself bound, as a member of the committee, to state the reasons which governed their acts, but not now, upon a question of printing a document that had no relation to the subject; and he hoped that he should not be considered by the Senator, and the Senate, as wanting in courtesy in not complying with the request made of him, for he had made it a rule of action to treat questions, independent in their character, at separate and distinct periods. This practice he had endeavored to carry out as far as possible, and he should do so now; and whether the course of the committee should be approved or disapproved, he hoped it might be decided when the bill came up, and not in an incidental manner.

MR. CALHOUN said, that although he very much regretted that they were not to have a detailed report, yet he must be permitted to say that he thought the course of the committee a very unusual one. A bill of acknowledged importance, if he might judge from the President's message and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the course of the Senate last session, was, after a full debate, referred to the Committee on Finance, because that committee was particularly constituted to advise on the subjects to which it related; yet that committee treated it as one of the most insignificant questions, and despatched it without a written report. This all might be very right, but it certainly was very extraordinary and unusual.

He had been there several years, both as presiding officer and as a member of the body, and he must say, that this was the first time he had ever known a question to be put to the chairman of a committee which he refused to answer. As a representative of one of the States of this Union, he must say that he had a right to an answer. The bill had gone to the committee, had received its disapprobation, and the committee ought to let them know the grounds on which they objected to it. If there was no surplus, let us (said Mr. C.) hear the committee say so. If there was one, then, said he, let us hear what objections the committee have to depositing it with the States. He made no complaints, but he must say the course of the committee was very extraordinary.

MR. HUBBARD remarked, that he was at all times in favor of giving to the people all the information which could be communicated to them, either through their Governors or the Legislatures of the several States, in relation to every subject connected with the legislation of Congress; and he was the last man who would withhold information from his constituents, which could, by any possibility, give them any light upon the acts of their representatives.

He would request the Secretary of the Senate to read the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri. After it was read, Mr. H. remarked that the resolution was as he supposed, and he was entirely at a loss to know what was the particular object of his friend from Missouri, in that part of his resolution which required that five copies of the document referred to, should be sent to the Governors, and that twenty copies of the same document should be sent to the Legislatures of the several States. From the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, it seemed to him that this document was in some way or other to have some effect upon the deposit bill of the last session, and he could not see in what way the communication of these documents to the Legislatures could have any effect whatever upon their action on that bill. Congress has passed that bill—it was to take effect within a very few days—on the first day of January next. The money then in the Treasury was to be set apart, and to be taken under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury from the deposit banks, and transferred to the State treasuries for deposit and for safe keeping, in pursuance of the particular provisions of the bill itself.

The printing of the document may be useful to the Senate—it may be important to them for their information and guidance with reference to the bill presented by the Senator from South Carolina, to continue in force the deposit bill. But it could not be of any practical benefit to the Legislatures of the States, in relation to the bill of the last session. Whether wisely or not, Congress had passed that bill, and the States were soon to receive the benefit of it. And he would suggest to the Senator the propriety of so amending his resolutions, as to confine the printing for the use of the Senate, and not to require that printed copies of this document should be sent to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States. With a knowledge of what probably would be in the Treasury on the first day of January, as the unexpended balances of former appropriations are very great, and a decided majority of the Senate gave their votes in favor of the deposit bill of the last session, it certainly would not be difficult to show that this document fails to give correct information. The gentleman from Missouri, he presumed, could not desire to have this document communicated to the State Legislatures, unless he believed it would impart useful information to them. And for one, he could not but believe that was calculated to make an erroneous impression upon the public mind; to misguide and to mislead the action of those Legislatures in relation to that bill. Without saying more at this time, he did hope that the Senator from Missouri would amend his motion, as had been suggested.

MR. BENTON asked the Secretary to read the caption of the document. The Secretary read it; and Mr. B. inviting the attention of the Senate to the words of the caption, and that the first day of January next was the time to which the unexpended balances were computed, pointed out that this was exclusive of sums which might be in the hands of disbursing officers, and which, though still charged to them, might be all expended, and would be by the end of the quarter. The sums in the hands of disbursing officers was no fund to meet these fourteen and a half millions, but were intended to be expended by the last day of the present quarter. The five millions left in the Treasury will be a fund, as far as it goes, to meet the fourteen and a half millions; but nine and a half millions will still remain to be reimbursed by the States, or to be levied by taxes on the people. The objects are not of a nature to be dispensed with, and the money to complete them must be got somewhere. This is material information to give to the States, and to give to them now, while their Legislatures are occupied with the question of our deposit act, and some for treating it as a deposit, and some as a distribution. With this document before them, no State can treat it as a distribution; no one can look upon the deposit as money for which the Government has no use; but every one will see that there is indispensable need for it; and by looking at the date of each appropriation, they will see that this unavoidable surplus was forcibly created by keeping off appropriations until it was too late to expend them. Every body knew that the struggle of the last session was to keep off appropriations, and that the organization of committees gave the opposition the power to keep them off. In this way, the unavoidable surplus was violently and forcibly produced. Several millions were defeated altogether; namely, the anticipation of the foreign indemnities, by which the United States would have bought four millions of gold, bearing an interest of 4 and 5 per cent.; the army increase bill was defeated; the new fortification bill defeated; the New Orleans customhouse, the bill for the purchase of the Louisville and Portland canal, and others, to the amount of six or seven millions. From the beginning to the end of the session, he stood upon the ground, that if the proper appropriations were made, and made in time to be used, there would be no more surplus than had often been in the Bank of the United States, without exciting the least alarm in the bosoms of those who could now see nothing but corruption, danger, and ruin, from the like sums in the ninety different banks which now hold the public deposits. The United States Bank often held fourteen, sixteen, or eighteen millions of public money, and not a word is said about corruption; not more than that amount would have remained in all the deposit banks, if the necessary appropriations had been made, and made in time to be used. He wished this document to go to the people of the States, that they might see these facts. He knew it was somewhat ungracious to ask this Senate, so many of whom had voted for the deposit act, to furnish this evidence of the error under which they legislated; but certain it is, that many of them voted for it as a deposit law, in fact, as well as in name, and not as a distribution law, under a false title, in decision of the constitution. Such Senators should have no objection to sending this document to the State Legislatures, to let them see the objects for which a reimbursement of this money must be made, or unnecessary taxes kept up to supply its abstraction. But of one thing he was certain, whether the Senate sent the document to the States or not, it would go the States. After this attempt to suppress it, all must desire to see it.

MR. CALHOUN remarked, that he found the information which the gentleman from Missouri was so anxious to give the country, was already before the Senate in a very authentic form. It was to be found in the table of estimates accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He argued that, according to the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who estimated the unexpended balances of appropriation at $14,636,662, the sum of $3,013,389 would not be wanted. The Senator, therefore, in sending out a document, setting forth that $14,500,000 were required for outstanding appropriations, would mislead the public, and make a false impression. Mr. C. contended that, taking the five millions which must be left in the Treasury, on account of the deposit act, from the eleven and odd remaining of the fourteen millions, together with the money at present in the hands of the disbursing officers, there would be funds enough on hand, within a small amount to meet the outstanding appropriations. Now, when it was admitted by every one that the surplus which would be on hand at the end of the next year would amount to at least twenty-five millions of dollars, (and for himself he entertained no doubt that it would be thirty, unless the country should be disturbed by a war, or some other unforeseen catastrophe,) he would seriously ask, was there a Senator on that floor, of any party, who would say, in a time of profound peace, (for he would not call the Seminole war interrupting the peace of the Union,) and recollecting the fact that this administration came in as a reform administration, that a tax should be raised, or that the money distributed under the deposit bill, should be refunded in order to make extravagant appropriations? He (Mr. Calhoun) could not believe it. He knew that attempts would be made to prevent the renewal of the deposit act, though he could not say that this was one of them. But let him tell gentlemen that these attempts would only produce a reaction, and end in their defeat.

MR. C. in conclusion, adverted to the subject of a reduction of the revenue, and the necessity of bringing it down to the legitimate wants of the Government. He insisted that the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the consideration of this matter, were bound to show, in a satisfactory manner, either that there would be no surplus next year, or to admit the necessity of making an adequate reduction of the revenue.

MR. BENTON said the document which had been read, to wit: the estimate of appropriations for 1837, was not unknown to him. He was no stranger to the document itself, or to the laws under which it was annually framed. One part of it, that of the estimate for the service of the ensuing year, was framed under an act as old as the Government; the other part of it, that which related to the unexpended balances, was more in order, and was framed under an act of 1820, to carry into effect more completely an act of 1795, relative to unexpended balances. This act of 1795 contains all appropriations in force for two full years after the year in which they are made; and at the end of those two years, directs any balance that may remain, to be carried to the surplus fund. The act of 1820 was to facilitate the understanding and use of these balances; and for that purpose it directed the Secretary of the Treasury to annex to them his annual estimate of appropriations, divided into three heads, according to the act of 1795; one head was to show what part of the unexpended balances of the expired year would be wanted, in the first of the two next years, and what part in the second of them, and what part would not be wanted at all; and so would go to the surplus fund. Thus the unexpended balances are now, and ever since 1820, have been shown in three columns, headed as directed by the eighth section of that act. Thus they stand in this estimate; and the amount under each head is, first, for the service of 1837, there will be wanted of these unexpended balances the sum of $11,427,480; for 1838, there will be wanted $3,013,389; and there will remain the sum of $195,183, which will not be wanted at all in either of the two years, and therefore will go to the surplus fund. The aggregate of these three sums makes the $14,636,062 mentioned in the President's message, and also in the document of the estimates; and the aggregate of the two first sums will make the amount in this second document which is now asked to be printed. In this document the third head or column is dropped, because the amount in it is no longer wanted; and the two heads in the first and second columns are united, and made into one, because the object was to know how much of the appropriations were unexpended, and would be wanting in the next two years. This document shows that near fourteen and a half millions will be wanting, of which five millions remain in the Treasury, and about nine and a half go to the States. It is certainly desirable to the States to know at once that these nine and a half millions will be wanted in two years, and part of it the first year. This is the intimation in the President's message. Mr. B. read the passage:

"The unexpended balances of appropriation on the first day of January next, are estimated at $14,636,062, exceeding by $9,636,062 the amount which will be left in the deposit banks, subject to the draft of the Treasurer of the United States, after the contemplated transfers to the several States are made. If, therefore, the future receipts should not be sufficient to meet these outstanding and future appropriations, there may be soon a necessity to use a portion of the funds deposited with the States."

Mr. B. said, here was a clear declaration that these unexpended balances were to meet these outstanding appropriations; and if the future receipts into the Treasury did not meet them, the States might soon be called upon for a part of their deposits. Now, here was a question, first for the Finance Committee, and afterwards for Congress. Would they keep up unnecessary taxes to meet these balances, or call upon the States to refund? He, for one, should be against keeping up the taxes for this object, and should be for calling on the States, and therefore would show them at once the specific objects for which the money was wanted.

Mr. B. read another passage from the President's message to show that these moneys must be refunded by the States, or taxes, otherwise unnecessary, must be kept up to supply their place; so that, in no event, could they be called and treated as an unavoidable surplus for which the Government has no use:

"No time was lost, after the making of the requisite appropriations, in resuming the great national work of completing the unfinished fortifications on our seaboard, and of placing them in a proper state of defence. In consequence, however, of the very late day at which those bills were passed, but little progress could be made during the season which has just closed. A very large amount of the moneys granted at your last session accordingly remains unexpended; but as the work will be again resumed at the earliest moment in the coming spring, the balance of the existing appropriations, and in several cases which will be laid before you with the proper estimates, further sums for the like objects, may be usefully expended during the next year."

Mr. B. repeated, the Government has a use for this money, and a use so urgent, that she must raise it by taxation, if any of the States violate the deposit act, and hold on to the moneys as their portion of a distributive fund.

To make this matter too plain for mistake, too obvious for commentary, and too imperative to be disputed, Mr. B. would refer to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the annual estimates, and showing these unexpended balances, and expressly including them in his estimate for the service of 1837 and '38. This is the letter referred to:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, }
December 6, 1836. }

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, for the information of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the appropriations proposed to be made for the service of the year 1837, amounting to $20,354,442 57

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous,	2,925,670 62
Military service, including fortifications, armories, arsenals, ordnance, Indian affairs, revolutionary and military pensions, and internal improvements,	10,758,431 33
Naval service, including the marine corps,	6,670,340 62

To the estimates are added statements, showing,

1. The appropriations for the service of the year 1837, made by former acts, including arming and equipping the militia, civilization of Indians, revolutionary claims, revolutionary pensions under the act of 7th June, 1832, claims of the State of Virginia, gradual improvement of the navy, and public debt, 2,347,000 00
2. The existing appropriations which will not be required for the service of the year 1836, and which it is proposed to apply in aid of the service of the year 1837, amounting to 3,013,389 34
3. The existing appropriations which will be required to complete the service of the year 1836, and former years, but which will be expended in 1837, amounting to 11,427,489 87

There is also added to the estimates a statement of the several appropriations, which will probably be carried to the surplus fund at the close of the present year; either because the objects for which they were made are completed, or because these sums will not be required for, or will no longer be applicable to them, amounting to $195,183 64.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JAMES K. POLK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

With these views of the subject, and these references to the President's message, and the Secretary of the Treasury's letter, Mr. B. held it to be well proved that the document which he proposed to have printed and sent to the States, was not a false or deceptive paper, to mislead and confuse the public mind, but a document true and perspicuous, calculated to instruct and inform the public mind, and to save all good citizens from the danger of falling into the error of considering the moneys deposited with the States as an unavoidable surplus, for which the Government has no use, and which they may consequently treat as their own. This document, if printed, will save all good citizens from that error, and show them that the Government has actually appropriated a large part of the money deposited with them, and must get it back, or raise it again by taxes.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had certainly made no complaint of inaccuracy on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury. He presumed that his calculations were perfectly accurate; but what he complained of was, that the Senator from Missouri proposed to send out a document which was not correct, with a view to show the outstanding appropriations remaining unsatisfied. He maintained that the document was entirely pernicious, for it set forth what was not really the truth of the case, and all that he desired was that the public should not be deceived on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS had but one word to say in regard to this matter. If he understood this proposition, it was to give information to the States, to regulate their conduct in some legislation it was supposed they were about to be engaged in. It was information, therefore, of some importance, if it was to regulate the conduct of the States in that particular. But then, if it be important, and is to be of service, it ought to go in a correct form. Now, how did the Senator from Missouri propose to send out this information? It was, that there was now an unexpended balance of appropriations of fourteen millions of dollars, and the inference was, that the money must be called back from the States to meet these balances when wanted.

Now, if this was a fact, the information had better be sent out, but if the tendency of it was to mislead every body, it ought not to be given. The President said that there was a balance of unexpended appropriations of fourteen millions of dollars, and when the five millions left in the Treasury by the provisions of the deposit law was deducted from this sum, then there would remain nine millions; and the President proceeds to say, that if there should be no money in the Treasury to meet this balance, then Congress must make some arrangement for that purpose. Now he called upon the Senator from Missouri to show, and it was incumbent on him to do so, that there would be no money in the Treasury to meet these balances. Now, did the Senator from Missouri propose to show any such thing? No, he did not pretend to say that the receipts into the Treasury would not be sufficient to meet all demands. What was to be the consequence of sending abroad this document? Was it to create an alarm, and prevent the States from making use of the money placed in their hands? Was there any reason to suppose that there would be a deficiency of the revenue? Has your Secretary of the Treasury, asked Mr. D. said that there will be any deficiency of the revenue? No, sir; no such thing; he suggests the bare, naked fact, that there will be fourteen millions of dollars of unexpended appropriations of the last year. Well, what did the Senator from Missouri say in regard to the revenues of the country? Why, he chided and rebuked them all (and he took it very kindly, for he was subject to such rebukes) for staving off appropriations at the last session, and in the end withholding appropriations. Well, sir, said Mr. D. I plead guilty to the charge; I was one of those who resisted the double and triple appropriations on the fortification bill, (and I see those around me who did the same,) and sleeping or waking I have never had occasion to regret the course I then took. Why, did the Senator know what were the actual expenditures of the last year? If he did not, he could know it by looking at the President's message and accompanying documents, and he would find that they amounted to thirty-two and some odd millions of dollars; and, if he understood matters, this fourteen millions was to be added to it—making forty odd millions appropriated last session. Sir, (said Mr. D.) compare this with the appropriations of any other administration, and see what has been appropriated by this very reluctant Congress, who have been chided for staving off appropriations and for withholding appropriations. Find, if you can, (said Mr. D.) a parallel to this sort of extravagance. He was astonished that any Senator could rise in his place and indulge in such rebukes as the Senator from Missouri had, after the extravagant appropriations of the last session.

The Senator seemed to consider this a question, whether this money should lie in the Treasury, to be disposed of by the officers of the Government on their responsibility, or go to the people of the States, from whom it came. This was the question that was made there last winter, and he, for one, never could hesitate how to vote on it. After some further remarks, Mr. D. said he thought some misapprehension existed as to the information sent out from the two Houses of Congress. Did all these documents that were daily printed, go to the poor and uninformed? They who stood there knew better. If it was all a miserable farce; for long before they were sent out from there, they were printed and reprinted, and circulated all over the country.

As it had been customary to accede to the proposition to print an extra number of copies of any document asked for by an honorable Senator, he would not deny the Senator from Missouri the printing of the extra number of copies of this document; but he requested that the question as to printing, and as to the distribution of the copies when printed, might be taken separately.

Mr. BENTON replied to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Davis,) who had spoken of the large appropriations of the last year; but the gentleman had forgotten to mention two things, which would have spoiled the face of the large sum which he presented; first, that fourteen or fifteen millions of this sum were extra ordinarities growing out of Indian wars and Indian treaties; and next, that fourteen and a half millions more were appropriated at so late a day that they could not be expended. Mr. B. knew that these large appropriations were to figure in speeches out of Congress, as well as in it, and, therefore, took care before the rise of the last session of Congress to have a document prepared at the Treasury to show each object of appropriation, so that the extraordinaries might be seen, and no one deceived by the exhibition of the large amount appropriated. That document nullified the cry of extravagance so incontinently set up just before the Presidential election; and this document that he now asked for would nullify, in like manner, the idea of the unavoidable surplus for which Government had no use, if he should be so fortunate as to get it printed and distributed through the States. The great error of the party to which the gentleman belonged, was in acting upon a certain notion which possessed all their heads, namely, that the said party possessed all the learning, all the talents, all the wit, all the genius, all the religion, morality, civility, decency, and politeness, now extant in our America; for, in acting on this notion, they necessarily considered the people as having none of those valuable qualities, as they themselves possessed all; and, therefore, they could pass off any thing they pleased upon the Boætian multitude. This error, though comfortable in itself, and so well calculated to keep a man on the best of terms with himself, had been the source of innumerable miscarriages to the gentleman's party, and would be the source of several more. This surplus conception would be one of them. All the work of the last session to create the surplus, was distinctly seen by the country; every body knew that every branch of the public service was suffering for money, and clerks raising money at usurious interest to live on, and officers raising money on their own credit, while the two Houses of Congress resounded with the cry of surplus millions, and so may labored to stave off, cut down, and defeat appropriations, in order to create surpluses for distribution. Another great error was to suppose that immense popularity was to be gained now by pushing the system of annual distributions, and endeavoring to out-run, out-leap, and out-jump one another in the glorious race of making and dividing surpluses. But the people saw through it all, and despised it all, and went for a reduction of taxes, and no surplus. They knew that the whole business was unconstitutional, corrupt and demoralizing; and had no idea of seeing it kept up, and a regular attempt made to pension the States as paupers upon the Federal Government. They knew the absurdity and insanity of raising money one year to be paid back the next; they knew, without having read it in a book, that the famous phrase put into the mouth of Queen Elizabeth by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, and which he himself took from Demosthenes, contains all the wisdom which can be taught on this head; namely, that the "pockets of the people are the cheapest and safest treasuries for keeping surplus moneys which the Government can have." They know this; and the squabbles, intrigues, collusions, and bargains which they will soon see for enabling the few to handle these surpluses, and the doubtful or political objects to which they will be applied, will soon disgust them with the whole scheme; and if this document can be printed, they will see in it, the people of each State will see in it, objects as meritorious, and as near and as dear to them, as any that can be devised for the application of the moneys in their own Legislatures.

Mr. KING of Alabama said, of the extraordinary discussions he had ever heard in that body, that of this morning was the most extraordinary. He would ask the Senator from Missouri what object, what aim, and what end, he proposed to accomplish by the motion he had made, and the speech he had delivered? If, said Mr. K. it is designed to operate on the deposit bill of the last session, it is a matter that has gone by, and is now before the country for good or for evil. For himself, he felt no reluctance in submitting to the judgment the country will pass on the measure. If it be to victimize those who at the last session took a view of that subject different from that taken by the honorable Senator, then his motion was properly accompanied by the remarks we have just heard; for, said Mr. K. the Senator from Missouri and myself differed as widely at the last session as we appear to do now. He entertained the opinion then, that there would be a large, very large amount of money in the Treasury, which could not be appropriated without resorting to such extravagant expenditures, as no administration could even approach and retain the confidence of the country. He believed in common with many others that the saw around him, and with whom he felt proud to act, that it was their duty to devise some plan by which the Treasury could be relieved from the excess of revenue, and those who administered the Government freed from the suspicion that it would be used to effect improper purposes. Well, sir, said Mr. K. we believed that the best mode to effect those objects would be to deposit it with the people of the States, from whom it had been unnecessarily drawn. We believed that by this course, the friends of the administration were not only subserving the great interests of the country, but freeing it from the possibility of censure. Who will venture to assert, said Mr. K. that the placing this money in the treasuries of the several States, to be used as in the discretion of the State Governments, was best calculated to advance their interests, and subject to be returned whenever wanted for national purposes, was not a better and safer deposit for it, than to leave it with the deposit banks? Sir, (said Mr. K.) the bill passed, and passed with the strenuous opposition of the Senator from Missouri, who no doubt acted from the purest motives, and honestly believed that the money would be wanted to meet the expenditures of the General Government. Whether the Senator was right or wrong, I leave to the country to determine; but (said Mr. K.) while I am ready to give him credit for the purest motives in opposing the deposit bill, I will not consent to be held up to the American people as so unwise, so impolitic, and so unjust, as to lend myself to a system of distribution. Nor, sir, can it be charged upon me, or the political friends with whom I acted on that occasion, with the slightest semblance of correctness, that we endeavored to create a surplus for distribution, by delaying or withholding the necessary appropriations. Far from it; far from it. Sir, our appropriations nearly doubled the estimates from the various Departments at the commencement of the session. We knew that there was an overflowing Treasury, and we gave liberally; in most instances, more than could be expended; but the Senator complains loudly that this was produced by delaying the appropriations. He would not stop to inquire whether such delay, if it did take place, resulted from the course pursued by the opponents of the administration, or from the various schemes (some of them certainly of a most extravagant character) which were pressed upon the attention of Congress. When was it ever known that all the appropriation bills were passed through both Houses at an early period of the session? But we are told that not having passed bills in time to meet the expenditures of West Point, Harper's Ferry, and to pay the salaries of the clerks in the public offices, was evidence of a determination to create a surplus. Delays of this kind have frequently occurred since he had been a member of the Senate, and have no doubt always produced serious inconvenience to those whose pittance was thus withheld; but did any one ever before hear it gravely charged upon Congress, that the object of this delay was to create a surplus? He (Mr. K.) would repeat, that he had given his support to the most liberal appropriations, but at the same time had withheld his assent to propositions for squandering the revenue, based upon repeated calls to ascertain the maximum of expenditure. What was necessary to meet the proper and economical expenditures of the Government, he would never withhold; more he would not give, even at the risk of being charged with a design to create a surplus. Sir, (said Mr. K.) the republican doctrine, as he understood it, was to draw no more money from the pockets of the people than was required to meet the judicious expenditures of the Government; and if the revenue proved too great, reduce the taxes. Upon what principle, by what constitutional right do you tax the people, and draw money into the Treasury not required to carry on the operations of the Government? He held there was no such legitimate power, and the exercise of it was a gross usurpation. But we may be told that the compromise bill, as it has been termed, stands in the way of reduction. He, Mr. K., had voted for that bill, but imposed upon himself no obligation to hold sacred its provisions. He had so declared in his place. He had voted for it under a species of duress, arising from the peculiar situation in which a portion of our country was then placed. He had believed that it did not do justice to the extent we had a right to demand, but it was all which could then be obtained, and he had accepted it; nor would he now lightly disturb it. He believed that, by a reasonable reduction on such articles as would not affect the manufacturing industry of the country, and by confining the sales of your public lands to those who purchase for actual settlement, you will go far to reduce the receipts of the Treasury to an amount, little, if any, exceeding the wants of the Government. Let us try these reductions, and if even then a surplus should be found, we may cast about for some useful and constitutional mode for its disposition. But under no circumstances could he ever consent to the prospective legislation proposed by the Senator from South Carolina; a resort to such a system of distribution or deposit, call it which you will, would, in his judgment, be one of the greatest misfortunes which could befall the States; and all who regarded their rights should array themselves against such a project.

We are told by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Davis) that the appropriations of the last session had been extravagant beyond measure. They were liberal, sir, not extravagant. There was an overflowing Treasury, and the state of the country rendered them proper. The Indian appropriations had been great, but for them he gave his most cordial support, from policy, from justice, from humanity. The policy of their removal was the only sure policy, the only earthly mode by which that unfortunate race can be preserved as a people. Sir, my constituents felt this, and were prepared to justify expenditures which otherwise might appear extravagant, to effect objects so desirable.

Mr. K. said he was extremely sorry that it was necessary to enter into a discussion as to the effect of the deposit law of the last session. That effect was yet to be seen, and the States themselves had the responsibility of making a proper disposition of the money entrusted with them. Whether we, (said Mr. K.) in our ignorance, have deposited more money with them than we can spare, so that a portion of it will have to be called back for the necessary expenses of the Government, was another question. But such he did not understand would be the case. The argument of the Senator from Missouri, did not put it on that footing. There was no Senator, he believed, who was not satisfied that the five millions left in the Treasury by the provisions of the deposit act, with the receipts of the year, would be amply sufficient to meet all the appropriations as they were wanted. If, however, it should, by a bare possibility, turn out otherwise, there was not a State in the Union that would hesitate for a moment in answering any call on it that might be made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

He was not disposed (Mr. K. said) to complain of the course taken by the Senator from Missouri. If the object of the gentleman was to oppose a prospective distribution, it appeared to him that it would have been as well to have waited until the bill for such an object came before them. With regard to the manner in which that bill had been treated by the Committee on Finance, he believed, that as a reduction of the revenue was contemplated by them, they preferred to let it lie until it was found what could be done on that subject, without making a formal report. I go (said Mr. K.) for a reduction of the revenue down to the wants of the Government, and then we shall hear no more about deposit acts. I held that you have no right to create a surplus and then distribute it, and that, on the contrary, you ought to reduce the taxes. I hold it my duty to oppose, as far as my little influence extends, any prospective plan for a distribution of the surplus, and will be unwilling to act on any such bill until it shall be found that it is impossible to reduce the revenue by either of the two modes proposed.

Mr. K. said he felt himself bound to make this explanation in consequence of the course the debate had taken, as he had voted for the deposit law of the last session, believing that in doing so he was making the safest and least objectionable disposition of the vast sum accumulating in the Treasury. He should vote against the mode proposed by the Senator from Missouri, of distributing the extra copies of the document before them, because such distribution would be unusual, was calculated to give erroneous information, could do no good, and, by attaching an unnecessary importance to it, mislead those to whom it should be sent.

Mr. CALHOUN observed that if the document was to be printed, it had better be done in the form in which it already was, for that was by far the most accurate. But he did not see the slightest necessity for printing it, and hoped it would not be printed.

Mr. NILES said, that he would make a single remark. He had, in the course of the debate, heard but one reason assigned for sending this document to the States, which appeared to him to be entitled to any consideration: this was, that the information it contained might be useful to the Legislatures of the States, in giving a wise and prudent direction to their legislation in regard to the money they were about to receive under the provisions of the deposit act. This, he considered, was a legitimate, fair, and he would add, important object. There was too much reason to fear, he thought, that the States, or many of them, might make an unwise disposition of this fund, and perhaps such a disposition as would not be altogether consistent with the principles and spirit of the deposit law. Did he believe that this document contained information calculated to enlighten their course, and that it embraced all the information necessary and proper for that purpose, he might be willing to vote for so unusual and extraordinary a measure as that proposed by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. Benton.) He doubted, however, whether this document would answer any useful purpose. It did not contain all the information necessary, and he learned it would be more likely to mislead than to enlighten the action of the States. If any document could set public opinion right on this subject, he thought the message of the President was best adapted to do it. But he despaired of attaining this object: public opinion had taken its course, and settled down under peculiar circumstances, and cannot be changed by any document we can send to the States, or among the people. So far as it is wrong, it must work its own course.

Sir, said Mr. N. perhaps no law ever enacted by Congress has had so strange a destiny as the deposit act of last session. Its true character had been misrepresented, grossly misrepresented, both by friends and foes, by all parties throughout the whole Union. During its long and arduous struggle in this Hall, it was treated, by all who supported it at least, simply as a deposit bill. But the moment the question was finally decided, and before the bill had got really out of the Senate, what did we hear? Why, one voice was raised, a voice of triumph, calculated to give to the law a false character. And what did we witness afterwards? The friends of the measure, he meant the original friends, those who claimed its paternity, all united in every way and form, through their organs, the press, and in every other way, in giving a false character to the act. It was declared to be a distribution bill—a law for dividing the surplus revenue among the States. But this was not all, nor the worst. The opponents of the measure, united and made common cause with its friends, its original friends, in misleading the public and giving a false character to this law. Among them, his distinguished friend from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) had lent the influence of his great name and fame, the extent of which no one knew better than himself, to give a character to this act. He had no doubt the gentleman supposed he gave it its true character; yet some of us, (said Mr. N.) who had felt it a duty to support it, although as much opposed to the principle of distribution as that Senator himself, thought he gave it a false character. He declared it to be a distribution act, and the triumph of the scheme of dividing surpluses among States.

Under such circumstances, it had been found of no use to attempt to present to the public the true character of this measure. If we held up the act, and pointed the public mind to its plain letter and distinct provisions, which declare that the money is to be deposited with the States in trust for safe-keeping, and to be returned when demanded, we were told, "It is of no use, every body knows that this is a distribution of the surplus, and that the money will never be called for." Such were the circumstances under which public opinion had been formed, and it was in vain to think to change it by sending documents to the State Legislatures at this time. Nothing short of a voice from heaven could satisfy a large portion of the people that this money does not belong to the States, and it will be received and disposed of under these false and erroneous views.

In regard to the benefits or the evils of handing this surplus over to the States, they yet remained to be known. Of the dangers and difficulties which it will be likely to occasion, he was as sensible as any one. We have removed the burden from our own shoulders, and thrown it on to the States; we have sent the golden apple of discord among them, and it remains to be known whether it will be used for good or for evil—whether it will be a blessing or a curse.

The Legislature of his own State was now in session, and he was informed were distracted with the disposition of their share of the surplus. There were many schemes for disposing of it, and which would prevail he could not say; but presumed that the erroneous impressions to which he had alluded, would have their effect, and that the distribution principle would triumph, and that the fund would be divided and subdivided, he could not say to what extent. It was proposed to divide it up among the towns; and whether the distribution principle would stop there, or be followed out, might be doubtful; for so strong had this principle taken hold of public sentiment every where, that he should hardly be surprised to hear that a more thorough distribution had been made, and that the whole fund had been divided up per capita, among every man, woman, and child in the State, for safe-keeping. He hoped the fund would prove beneficial to the State, although for a time it may distract its councils. There were those however, who regarded the evil as greater than the benefit. A letter he had this day received from a friend on the spot, says, "For God's sake send no more money among us."

The conduct of many in regard to the deposit act had been very strange; they condemn the principle of distribution, they condemn the deposit bill, they condemn those who voted for it, yet they are willing to receive the money; nay, they seize upon it with the keenest avidity, and seem determined to follow out the principle of distribution, which they condemn, and determine to distribute, divide, and re-divide the fund until they can get a share of it into their own pockets. These are some of the first fruits of dividing up surpluses among the people.

But great as he considered the danger from sending this money among the States, he regarded the evils of its remaining in your Treasury, and the deposit banks, as still greater. Our act did not create the evils from this surplus, although it may have transferred them from this Government to the States. But the danger and the evil existed: it was here, it was upon Congress, tempting us to extravagant expenditures; it was upon the deposit banks, inflating and blowing up our whole paper system. Whatever else might follow, one thing was certain: we had removed the evil from Congress; we had thrown off a burden which rested heavily upon us, and which he considered was more than we could bear; he felt relieved and rejoiced to get clear of the difficulties which surrounded Congress the last session.

The only legitimate object of sending this document to the States, could not be accomplished; they had already taken their course, and must be permitted to go on. If the Senator from Missouri wished—which he presumed he did not—to send this paper to the States, to persuade them or the people that Congress had done wrong at the last session; that the money they were about to receive was wanted for the legitimate purposes of this Government; he could not aid him in that course; he could see no good that was to result from it, and it did not appear to be exactly just towards those who had voted for the deposit act, although disapproving of the principle of distribution.

It would be presumption in him to attempt to advise so distinguished and experienced a Senator as the gentleman from Missouri. But he might be permitted to say what would be his own course, and what appeared to him the course dictated by wisdom and policy. He would not revive the contentions of the last session; he would not unnecessarily fight our battles over again. Sufficient for the year are the evils thereof. Instead of attempting to use this unexpended balance of fourteen and a half millions, as an argument against the act of last session, he would make use of it to oppose the extension of the distribution principle; to resist the distribution scheme of the present session. The war is not over; all the projects of last session are revived; we have the land bill, and the bill for distributing surpluses to the States, already before us. Let us now make a stand, fortify our camp, and not uselessly waste our ammunition. We shall want the unexpended balance of last year's appropriations, and all other facts and arguments, which we can bring to our aid, successfully to resist powerful efforts which are to be made, to follow up the distribution of surpluses annually, until the system shall be fixed upon us as the settled policy of the Government. This appeared to him the wiser and better course; he could not therefore vote for the gentleman's motion.

Mr. HUBBARD said that when he was up before he had expressed a wish that the Senator from Missouri would so amend his motion as to confine the printing of the document for the use of the Senate; and after the discussion which had taken place, he felt confirmed in the propriety of that suggestion. The Senator had stated, as a reason for wishing to send this document to the State Legislature, that the question as to the manner of disposing of the deposit fund was now pending before them, and that the document was intended to inform them; that Congress had been apportioning money to the States for deposits; the sum of fourteen millions of dollars, which was an unexpended balance of appropriations which had actually been made, intending thereby to make the impression that this balance of appropriations must be had; and in order to supply the Treasury with the necessary moneys, a part of the money which would be deposited with the States after the first of January, in pursuance of the deposit bill of the last session would necessarily have to be returned to the Treasury, and intending also to produce an influence upon the action of the Legislature upon this subject, and moreover to hold up those who were the avowed friends of this bill to the odium of their constituents, for sending among them money, required for the use of the Government. He was so unfortunate as to have differed from the Senator from Missouri, as to the propriety and policy of passing that deposit bill. He gave it his support. He had seen no cause to regret that vote. He then believed it right and proper, and demanded from a just regard to the public interest. He still believed the same, and under the same circumstances, he should not hesitate to give a similar vote upon the same subject. He had voted for bill, and he had also voted for the appropriation bills, which are enumerated in the document proposed to be printed. He well understood the effect of his vote; and he, for one, was then entirely satisfied that the whole amount of those appropriations could not be expended before the first day of January next, and yet that part of itself had no influence upon his mind, to deter him from giving his support to the deposit bill. The whole history of our legislation, since the foundation of the Government, will show an unexpended balance of former appropriations remaining in the Treasury at the commencement of each succeeding year. The unexpended balance on the coming first day of January, will undoubtedly be larger than usual; but after deducting the five millions left in the Treasury, according to the provisions of the deposit bill, the sum will be reduced to about the usual unexpended amount of appropriations. But the document, unaccompanied with any other fiscal statement, as he had before remarked, would certainly give wrong impressions, and tend to darken, rather than enlighten, the public mind as to the true condition of the Treasury. A reference to the Secretary's report upon the finances, would show what would be the probable condition of the public Treasury at the close of the year 1837. There could be no mistake about this matter; making the ordinary appropriations, and calculating only upon a receipt of five millions from the sale of the public lands, instead of their being deficit in the sum of fourteen millions, there would not be a deficit of over two or three millions upon the showing of the Secretary himself. The document, he again repeated, was calculated to mislead, and unless it could be accompanied with an official statement of what would be the means of the Treasury on the 1st day of October, 1837, when the deposit bill will have been executed, to meet all claims upon the Treasury, he should be opposed to sending it to the State Legislatures. He was entirely willing to give all desirable information; he would withhold nothing from them which could be useful; but the document, printed as it is proposed to print it, independent of the other official reports upon the state of the finances, would, it seemed to him, afford no useful information. He would venture to predict, that during the next fiscal year, there would not be any period when the Treasury would feel embarrassed from having deposited with the States the sum actually found in the Treasury on the first day of January. So far from it, in his belief, there would be found, at the close of the year, means sufficient to meet all claims upon the Treasury. He would, however, express the hope, that the Committee on Finance would be able to bring forward some measure, which in effect would leave hereafter, in the pockets of the people, "the best depositories of the public money," what will not absolutely be required for the use of the Government. Such a measure he should support. He would again, in conclusion, repeat his former request, that the Senator from Missouri would so amend his motion as to have the document printed for the use of the Senate. He had no objections to printing an extra number, but he had objections to sending this document, under the authority of the Senate, to the State Legislatures as a document designed to aid them in their action, which, he believed, was calculated to produce a contrary effect.

Mr. STRANGE rose and said, that he was but young in the Senate, and therefore it would be rash in him to lay down any rule for its action. But he might venture to say that on this, as every future occasion, he would vote in favor of printing any paper which was calculated to give information to the people. He understood there were very few gentlemen in this body who objected to the proposition of the Senator from Missouri to have the document in question printed; but the objection was to its being sent to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States, and he (Mr. Strange) concurred in that objection. He confessed that he was somewhat surprised to see the Senate thrown into a tumult from a mere proposition to print a document; but when he recollected how Senators were situated with regard to a measure, adopted at the last session, his wonder ceased. He could not vote to send a document out upon the grounds urged by the honorable Senator from Missouri. He was opposed to sending copies to the Legislatures and Governors of the States. And he was opposed to the proposition on another ground, the effect which it might seem it was intended to produce on the Governors and Legislatures. On the document reaching them, the natural inquiry would be: What was the object to be accomplished by sending us this document? It certainly was designed to have some effect: it is to operate on the Legislature? What right has Congress, or any portion of Congress, to dictate to us, or to either branch of our Legislature? Upon this matter (concluded Mr. S.) we are supreme and have no superior. We judge for ourselves, and think no man or body of men have a right to interfere. I therefore unite with the Senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. Hubbard,) in praying the Senator from Missouri to call to his recollection the fable of the boy and the filberts, and strike out that part of his proposition relative to sending copies of the document to the Governors and Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. BENTON accepted the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and modified his motion accordingly, so that one thousand extra copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

DEBATE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 29, 1836.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following memorial, presented at the last session of Congress, and laid on the table, and again brought to the attention of the House yesterday, by Mr. GALBRAITH of Pennsylvania:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents: That we, in common with a large portion of our fellow-citizens, have, for some time past, viewed with some degree of alarm the rapid encroachment of incorporated companies upon the liberties and rights of the people, particularly those established for the purpose of banking. As the system now exists in the several States incorporating companies for that purpose, it destroys, as we conceive, the design of the constitution of the United States, which prohibits the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, &c. The notes or bills of these banking companies, incorporated by the States, are rapidly taking the place of the constitutional currency of the country—gold and silver—and a continued fluctuation and uncertainty produced in the circulating medium, which the constitution intended should be steady and permanent. Under these circumstances, we beg leave, respectfully, to suggest to the consideration of Congress, the propriety of proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, for the adoption of the several States, restricting the incorporation of banking companies, and limiting them in their issues of bank notes. We wish not to be considered as asking for any powers being given to Congress to incorporate companies of this description, but simply the restricting of the States. We are opposed to the increase of power in the National Government, or a consolidated Government; but if the system before mentioned be permitted to progress as it has for the last few years, we apprehend the consequences to the community may be serious, and dangerous to the stability of our republican institutions.

Your memorialists beg leave further to represent, that they have understood that the new Bank of the United States, chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, is now re-issuing the notes of the old Bank of the United States, in which the United States was a stockholder to the amount of one-fifth of the stock; thus unwarrantably and fraudulently, as we believe, involving the faith and credit of the United States, bringing this State into collision with the other sisters of the Confederacy, and calculated to produce confusion and disorder in the circulating medium of the country. Your memorialists, therefore, beg leave to call the attention of Congress to the subject, to inquire whether the fact has been reported; and if so, if there are any means in the power of Congress to prevent such gross and improper practices upon the Government. And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

This memorial Mr. GALBRAITH having moved to refer to a select committee, and the question upon that disposition of it having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. GALBRAITH said: It is with great reluctance that I rise on the present occasion to address the House on presenting this memorial from a portion of my constituents, and asking for it that reference which I have moved. I am aware that the time of this House, at the present period, is precious; but, inasmuch as the object and purpose of the memorialists seem to be strenuously resisted by some, and by others not exactly comprehended, I feel myself called upon by a sense of duty and respect which I owe to them, to submit a few remarks in explanation of the views entertained by the memorialists, as I understand them.

I shall, in the first place, endeavor to show that this memorial, from the source from which it comes, and the subject on which it asks the inquiry of this body, is entitled to a respectful consideration, and a reference to some committee; and, in the next place, I think I shall be able to satisfy the members of this House that the appropriate direction is that which I have proposed, in moving that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Speaker, the memorial comes from a portion of the respectable and intelligent citizens of this Union, residing in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. It is clothed in respectful and appropriate language, and suggests considerations of deep and vital importance, not only to themselves and those of the State of Pennsylvania, but to the whole people of this wide-spread confederacy.

The memorial embraces two distinct subjects of inquiry; either of which, I apprehend, is of sufficient magnitude and importance to demand the grave and deliberate investigation of this body. The first is that of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, restricting the incorporation of banking companies by the States, and limiting such as may hereafter be incorporated in the issues of bank paper money. This proposition necessarily involves the inquiry, how far the constitution, as it now stands, in those clauses which provide that "the Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;" "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;" and that "no State shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts," contains a prohibition to the States to incorporate companies with authority to issue bank notes, or, in other words, bills of credit, and forms an agreement or compact already made on the part of all the States not to incorporate such companies. Without expressing, at present, any opinion of my own, or any indication on the part of the memorialists, on this branch of the inquiry, I will barely remark that the constitution has been construed, by some of the best political writers and economists this country has produced, as containing such prohibition or compact, (a constitution being neither more nor less than a compact or agreement.) Among these are names intimately connected with the constitution itself. Is there not strong reason to conclude that such was the intention of those who framed the constitution? They had experienced the evils of an uncertain currency; they had witnessed the derangements and confusion of bills of credit issued under the Provincial Governments, each province issuing bills of credit, according to its own circumstances, without regard to those of the others, and often very different in quantity and value. And they had also witnessed the no less fluctuation and evil results from the enormous issues and ruinous depreciation of the Continental paper. The same clause in the Constitution which yields to Congress, the general legislature for the whole of the States united, the power of fixing the standard of "weights and measure," surrenders to it the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Is there not the same reason that the standard of value or price should be uniform, and the same throughout all the States, as the standard of weight or that of measure? neither of which would probably be so, or, in the nature of things, could be so, without giving the power of regulation to the National Legislature. The provision was framed and adapted to a state of circumstances as they then existed; the States had, individually, on their own responsibility, and each according to its wants or the caprices of its Provincial Legislature, emitted "bills of credit," which circulated as money; became the circulating medium of price, and what was the price in one province was not the same in another. Against this, the framers of that instrument provided that "no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit," &c. It did not, perhaps, occur to them that the States would separately and individually authorize incorporated companies—infuse life into soulless bodies of their own creation, to do indirectly what they were prohibited from doing directly, by the solemn compact agreed to by all.

But, sir, it is true a different construction has practically obtained in most of the States. Companies incorporated by the different State Legislatures have grown up almost in every quarter, authorized to issue "bills of credit," or paper money, virtually supplying the circulating medium throughout the Union, necessarily and unavoidably varying the standard of value according to the amount and denomination of their issues. In some of the States they are authorized to issue bills of the denomination of one, two, and three dollars; in others limited to five dollars, as the lowest denomination; and in others progress is making to fix ten dollars as the lowest denomination. In some seven, eight, or ten paper dollars at times represent one of specie; in others, two or three, and in all different, at different times, and according as circumstances may operate upon them—the same evils, the same fluctuation and uncertainty in the standard of price, or rather the same want of standard of value, against which the constitution was intended to provide. What is worth nominally $3,000 this year, may, through the operations of those companies alone, be worth but $1,000 next. The price of labor and every product or commodity is controlled and governed according to the interests or the caprices of those incorporated companies, and the whole sovereignty, so far as regards the regulation of the currency, is, to all intents and purposes, surrendered to them; and every individual in the community, whether farmer, mechanic, merchant, or manufacturer, placed at their mercy. How far this state of things has been effected by the active vigilance and constant attention of the speculating few, always awake to their own particular interests, gradually framing and fitting up this complicated and delusive machinery while the industrious many were better employed, need not now be particularly inquired into; it is sufficient that it exists, and that it does, will not be denied by any one acquainted with the affairs of this community. If it be granted, therefore, that the constitution does not prohibit the incorporation of companies by the States to "emit bills of credit," it is only on the assumption that circumstances, as they then existed, did not require it. Is it not as important now to inquire and provide for a state of circumstances as they now exist as it was then? The evil is the same, and is it not subject to the same or similar remedy? The memorialists do not ask that any power should be vested in the General Government to incorporate banking companies, nor do they suggest an absolute prohibition of such power in the States; the former they expressly repudiate, and do not indicate the latter. All they seek is an inquiry how far good policy and the safety and permanency of the currency and its uniformity throughout the Union require that this power in the States should be restrained and limited, to effect the general good of the whole. The importance, the vital importance of every consideration touching the circulating medium of the country, affecting more or less the interests of every man, cannot be doubted.

If the importance of the subject, sir, is sufficient to entitle it to the deliberation of this House, the next inquiry is, to what committee can this branch of it be most appropriately referred? It looks to a constitutional remedy, a provision in the fundamental instrument itself. None other can be provided. This may and can, as well as as effectually now, to meet the circumstances now, as the constitution already formed provided against the circumstances then. A proposition to amend the constitution is beyond the appropriate and peculiar inquiry of any of the standing committees. It is as broad and general in its character as the Government is; if, and appropriate only for a select committee raised for the purpose; and such has been the inveterate practice here for years on all such propositions. Why then should not this proposition receive a similar direction with all others of a similar character?

The second subject of inquiry, Mr. Speaker, to which your attention is called by the memorial, is that of the reissues of the notes of the Bank of the United States since the expiration of its charter for all purposes except that of continuing its corporate name, to sue and be sued in order to close up the concerns of the institution. Notes issued by that bank while this Government was a stockholder to the amount of seven millions of the stock, previous to the 4th of March, returned for redemption, and redeemed, it is said, have been again issued and thrown into circulation. It is perhaps known to the members of this House that, in the month of February last, shortly before the expiration of the charter under the act of Congress of the 10th of April, 1816, by which it was incorporated until the 3d March, 1836, an act of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania was passed incorporating the same stockholders, except the United States, under the same name, and with the same amount of capital, thirty-five millions, for thirty years. One set of officers were elected for the old bank, in which the United States is a stockholder of seven millions; and a set of officers, being many of the same, for the new State bank in which the United States is not a stockholder. The new President of the old bank, (Matthew L. Bryan,) I believe, is a director of the new bank, and the former president of the old bank, now president of the new one under the State, (Nicholas Biddle,) I believe is one of the directors of the old bank. Several of the directors of the old are also directors of the new one, so that they may for all practical purposes be considered as the same men, although constituting two different boards of direction. Their legitimate duties are distinctly different. The proper business of the officers of the old bank is to wind up its affairs; to call in the notes of that bank, redeem from the proper sources, the funds of the old bank, and cancel the paper as having been returned and redeemed. The business of the new bank is to issue its own notes on the responsibility of its own officers and its own stockholders, unconnected with the old bank in which this Government was a large stockholder. Now, if the officers of the old bank, many of them being the same individuals as the officers of the new one, instead of cancelling the old notes when redeemed, re-issue the same through the new bank, as the President of the United States justly observes in his last annual message, it is either a fraud upon the Government, or upon the people. If the notes are to be redeemed a second, third, or fourth time, out of the funds of the old bank, what can it be but a downright fraud upon the Government, being a stockholder and a sharer in those funds; and not in those of the new one? The funds of the old bank must, of course, soon become exhausted, and the Government, instead of receiving her just proportion of the stock and profits, suffer the loss of having them applied to the redemption of the same notes which had been over and over again redeemed before. If the re-issued notes are to be redeemed out of the funds of the new bank, the holder has not the security for their redemption which the notes purport to give; or rather, he has no security at all; they are a gross and palpable deception upon him. The old bank, with the Government as a partner, bound in good faith and honor, whose notes they purport to be, and whose credit they bear, has once redeemed them, and therefore ought not to be bound again. The new bank is not bound for their redemption, because they are not its proper issues, and its obligation is not given, and it could not be made legally liable. It is true that, as long as it is the interest of the new bank to redeem such re-issues, they would most probably be redeemed; but should an honest holder of such notes be subject to the mere will of such an institution to decide whether he should receive his just debt or not, and be made to depend upon its interest, whether he had or had not a good security for payment? Such a conclusion would be cruelty. If such re-issues consist of notes of the denomination of five dollars, they are a glaring evasion of the provisions of its State charter, which prohibits its issuing notes of less denomination than ten dollars.

Sir, shall we, the representatives of the people, so far as this Government is concerned, sleep and slumber at our posts, and look calmly with indifference upon a practice such as this, both upon the Government and upon the community? Shall it be said that there is no remedy in the power of Congress? That we have nothing to do with the State institution of Pennsylvania? I admit that, so far as regards the State bank issuing its own notes, upon its own responsibility, we have nothing to do with it, and have no control whatever over it; but I am not prepared to admit that such is the case with regard to the old bank chartered by Congress, and its officers. Although it has ceased for some purposes, that of discounting notes and issuing its paper, &c. it still exists for other purposes, that of winding up its affairs, settling with its debtors, creditors, and stockholders, and redeeming its floating paper, and still under the regulation of the power which gave it birth. Were the act of 1816 granting the charter even silent on this subject, it would follow, as a matter of course, that the mode and manner of winding up its concerns should be placed under the direction of Congress; but that act contains an express provision, in its 17th section, "that Congress may, at any time hereafter, enact such laws enforcing and regulating the recovery of the amount of the notes, bills, obligations, or other debts," &c. and this power exists as well after the expiration of its charter, for the purpose of a final settlement and liquidation of its affairs, as before. Is it not, then, competent for Congress to legislate so as to regulate and control, and even punish the conduct of the officers of the old bank? And if they so far mismanage its affairs as to authorize or permit its notes to be re-issued and put again into circulation, after they have been once redeemed, I ask if it is not a fair and legitimate subject for the legislation of Congress, and one which demands our serious and grave deliberation? Again: at the last session of Congress, an act was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, as the agent of the Government, to settle the claim of the United States as a stockholder with the bank. By his report, which has been laid upon your tables, it appears that duty has been discharged, as far as it could be on his part; but no satisfactory information has been given by the officers of the bank how much is due to the Government, or when or in what manner it shall be paid. Instead of settling up the affairs of the institution with the Government, its largest stockholder, now no longer a stockholder, according to the provisions of the act of Congress of last session, we find its officers, if what is said be true, and it has not been denied, being also officers of the new bank, practising a gross fraud upon this Government and this nation, treating with neglect and contempt your agent authorized to settle with them; and its president, at the head of the great broker fraternity, commencing an unprovoked attack and making war upon the measures of your administration. I do not desire that the proposition I have made should be drawn into a partisan discussion, or assume a political character; it is one which affects the great interests of the country, and in that light only do I wish it to be considered; and in that point of view, it must be apparent to every one, as demanding mature and grave consideration, as well as prompt and decisive action. I am aware that it opens a field for discussion, upon which much might be said, to show the extent and depth of the evil, the various remedies which might be proposed, either those operating by mere inducement, or those by direct provision or legislative sanction. But I think I have said enough on this more question of reference; it is time enough to go into more detail when the subject is referred, and brought back again on some distinct proposition.

Then to what committee should this branch of the subject embraced in the memorial be referred? It may be said that all subjects relating to the Bank of the United States have already been committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, in the disposition of the President's message. But, sir, it is well known that the appropriate and legitimate duties of that committee are of a financial rather than a judicial or general character—to take into consideration propositions relating to the revenues of the country, and appropriations of money. This part of the memorial seeks for legislative remedy against a supposed evil of a general nature, not peculiarly affecting the revenue, but the community at large; rather of a judicial than financial character, but partaking partly of both, and therefore not exclusively appropriate to either, but the proper subject for a select committee, more broad and general in its inquiries.

I have said thus much by way of explaining the views and objects of the memorialists. I have endeavored to discharge my duty to them, as well as to the nation whose interests I am bound, as far as my feeble abilities will enable me, to serve, and whose constitution I am sworn to support. I have sought to give to the memorial the direction to which I thought it, from its importance and peculiar character entitled. If its purpose be comprehended, I am satisfied. It remains for the House to give to it that disposition to which it may be thought entitled.

Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts said that he hoped no such reference as had been proposed would be given to the memorial. His attention had been casually drawn to its character, and he trusted that, before any disposition was made of it, it would be better understood by the House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Galbraith) has said that the memorial was of a various character. He (Mr. L.) believed that, when analyzed, it would be found to be of a very extraordinary character. Such an appeal, he would venture to say, had never before been made to the consideration of Congress. It was altogether peculiar and anomalous. It had been brought up from the files of a former session, and from an abstract of the contents of the paper, as given in the Globe of this morning, the House might learn something of its object.

It was his (Mr. L.'s) intention, before he sat down, to propose so to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to send the memorial to the committee already appointed on the subject of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, for it seemed to him to belong more properly to one of those pigeon holes kept in reserve for matters of this description, than to the custody of such a committee as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had in view. From the manner in which the subject is now brought forward, as well as from the place of its origin, he feared there was something concealed and sinister to be accomplished. He asked the attention of the House to the character of the paper, as given in the abstract to which he had referred. It commenced with a lamentation on the encroachments of incorporated companies upon the rights and liberties of the people, and especially insists upon the danger to personal rights and civil liberty from the practice of the State Governments to create banking institutions. This is no less than an arraigning of State legislation. The wisdom, if not the purity of the State Governments is impeached at the bar of this House, and that authority and discretion which have been exercised for nearly half a century in the constitution of incorporated companies, comes now to be denounced as an abuse of power, dangerous to the liberties of the people. By whom (asked Mr. L.) is the power which is thus complained of exercised, and from whom is it derived? By the immediate representatives of the people, deriving all their authority directly, by delegation, from the people themselves. The complaint is a libel upon the good sense, the virtue, and the patriotism of the country. And was it true that there existed in every part of the Union incorporated companies, which were continually encroaching on popular rights, while only some twenty individuals in the State of Pennsylvania were heedful of the danger, and all the rest of the community unconsciously slumbering over their injuries? The suggestion was unworthy of serious notice.

But, (proceeded Mr. L.) these pure minded and patriotic memorialists do not rest their allegations upon mere generalities. They point out to the attention of this House the specific violations of the constitution which State legislation has committed. The creation of banking corporations, say they, contravenes that provision of the constitution which prohibits the States from coining money, and emitting bills of credit. National sovereignty is thus invaded, and the safeguards of the people violated! Surely the objection is presented here for the first time, at rather too late a day for the intervention of the power of Congress to a prevention of the evil, if the application of that power could even have been so directed. Singular, however, as was the objection when addressed to the consideration of this House, it had not altogether the merit of novelty. The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his speech has seemed, indeed, to give to it the sanction of his countenance. He (Mr. L.) remembered to have read, in the early history of banking institutions in his own State, something of a newspaper argument to the same point, but it had been overruled and repudiated by the judgment of wise and intelligent men, and by the uniform legislation of the States on the subject. Its serious repetition as a practical rule of action would now be scouted by every considerate politician in the country. He could not believe that any gentleman worthy of a seat on this floor would attempt to sustain for a moment an argument upon the objection.

But the memorialists complain of the abuses and perversions of the powers of chartered corporations; of the exclusive privileges and monopolies which they confer, and of their encroachment upon the just and equal rights of all the citizens. And what is the measure of remedy which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would propose by his select committee? Most certainly not the exercise of a supervisory authority by Congress over State legislation. This would more directly conflict with the constitution, which guaranties to the States the exercise of all the powers not granted to the Federal Government. If these powers are indiscreetly exercised by the States, redress is with the people; but if the ground of complaint be in the abuse of a limited and delegated authority conferred by acts of incorporation, the appeal is to the source of that authority, the Legislature itself, or to the judiciary. In either case, the remedy is not to be found here. It is at home with the memorialists themselves, and the constituents of those who administer their government; with the people, and those who are accountable to the people. Congress has no power over the subject. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania pretend that Congress had such power? And was this the argument upon which this select committee was to be raised.

But he (Mr. L.) was desirous of calling the attention of the House more particularly to another part of the memorial. As if aware that neither the measure of prevention nor redress for existing grievances rested with Congress, these twenty or more memorialists gravely request that the assembled wisdom of the nation would propose to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by which they may be restrained in the exercise of their own jurisdiction and sovereignty. The States were to be called upon to surrender the right which they had enjoyed for a period of time coeval with their existence, and under the authority of which institutions had been created in all the departments of business, and in aid of every important interest in the community. An amendment of the constitution, prohibiting the States from granting acts of incorporation! Is there a man weak enough to believe that such a proposition would find favor with a single Legislature in the Union? or mad enough, in the present state of the business concerns of the country, to desire its success? What! ask a State Legislature to surrender a portion of its State sovereignty; to deny to itself a salutary power lest it may be unwisely and unprofitably used; a power now become essential to the prosperity of the people, and without which there could be no security for present possessions, or hope of improvement in the future.

But it may be said that the restriction proposed is of banking incorporations only, and the amendment would operate but a partial abridgment of a questionable authority. It is sufficient to reply, that the authority has been claimed and exercised by the oldest States, from the earliest period, and by the youngest almost as the first act of their sovereignty. Both its existence and its exercise have become indispensable to the welfare of the country. As well might the power of enacting municipal regulations be denied to the State Legislatures, as, in the present state of things, the right of granting to the operations of business the facilities of banking institutions be withdrawn. The gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, upon his own responsibility, will not venture to propose it. He adroitly and somewhat cautiously advocates sending the subject to an inquiry only, without suggesting an opinion of what should be the definite result.

But he (Mr. L.) would put it to the House to consider the effect of the proposition. An amendment to the constitution could have no retrospective operation. It could not impair the existence or the powers of banks already created. In restraining the States from further grants, it would but increase the influence and augment the power for mischiefs, if that was their tendency, as the memorialists assume, of such as were already in being. It would, indeed, be to create exclusive privileges, and constitute, during the continuance of pre-existing charters, odious moneyed monopolies. And was this the purpose the memorialists had in view? He would submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to answer.

Mr. L. contended that it was most obvious nothing of legitimate legislation could come of the reference of the memorial to a select committee of this House. The alleged abuses by the State banks, and the supposed danger to public liberty from the existence of such institutions, were subjects not within the cognizance of Congress. They belonged to, and might properly be addressed to the consideration of, the people. The proposition to amend the Constitution in the particular pointed out in the memorial was too preposterous to be entertained for a moment. The gentleman who asks the reference will not do himself the discredit to advocate the measure. There must be something, then, in the motive for the presentation of the memorial, at this time, beyond that which meets the eye. A further reference to the document may explain the object; I would not be misunderstood, (said Mr. L.) not the object of the gentleman, but of the memorialists, of persons not here but elsewhere. If he recollected rightly the contents of the paper, it conveys a complaint of a violation of law by the bank of the United States, and hence, probably, the inducement for an appeal to Congress. The Bank of the United States, say the memorialists, has reissued bills before redeemed, and which, by law, should thereafter have been excluded from circulation. What bank has committed this outrage upon public law, and what bills have been thus reissued? The Bank of the United States, chartered by the authority of the State of Pennsylvania, has reissued the bills of the Bank of the United States, chartered by the authority of the Federal Government. Admitting the truth of the accusation, he (Mr. L.) upon his responsibility as a lawyer, would tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that Congress had no power over the matter. He would plead to the jurisdiction. He denied the right of Congress to institute an investigation into the conduct of a bank deriving its existence and holding its powers from State authority, or of inquiring into any of its measures. The Bank of the United States incorporated by the State of Pennsylvania, is such an institution. It owes no accountability to the Federal Government, and is amenable to no animadversion from this source. Whether it has issued its own bills, or reissued the bills of other banks, lawfully or unlawfully, it may well deride the authority of this body to take cognizance of the matter. It belongs to the Government of the State, and to that only, in its legislative or judicial department, to punish any infraction of its charter. If an offence consists in the facts charged by the memorialists, it is not for this House to apply the corrective. Nor can it be urged that the aspect of the case is changed by considering the Federal Bank of the United States privy to the reissue of its bills by the State institution; for what rule of law does this violate? Is any gentleman here (inquired Mr. L.) so little conversant with the business of banks as not to know that these institutions are daily receiving the bills of each other, and as freely paying them out as their own original issues? The memorial alleges no agency of the Federal Bank in the act complained of; imputes no refusal to redeem its paper; charges no neglect of duty, or violation of obligation. What, then, is to be inquired into? That which, if admitted, constitutes no wrong in the corporation subject to your jurisdiction, and, if any crime in another, is entirely beyond your control.

Mr. L. proceeded, at some length, to show that the memorial contained nothing to which the inquiry of a committee could properly be directed, and that its presentation, at this time, was delusive and colorable; intended to cover other and unwelcome objects. It is not (said Mr. L.) in my nature unworthy to distrust the motives and suspect the honest purposes of others; and I beg again the gentleman from Pennsylvania to understand that I ascribe to him no improper views in this matter. But there may be those who, it may not be uncharitable to suspect, in the absence of all other discoverable motive, may intend more than the gentleman himself is aware of. It is possible, even, that this memorial is brought up, at this time, not for the purpose of correcting existing abuses, but for party political effect—not here, in this House, but elsewhere—at home, in the county, with the people of Pennsylvania.

This House (continued Mr. L.) need not be informed that it had been doubted by some gentlemen whether the power of the Legislature of Pennsylvania had been wisely exercised in the recharter, as it was termed, of the Bank of the United States as a State institution. This was a question with which he conceived the House had nothing to do. For himself, he had felt no personal interest in the fate of the old bank, and had no especial sympathy with those who mourned over its destruction; neither did he take any concern, such as the memorialists of Pennsylvania might indulge, in the new institution, which, like a Phoenix, had arisen from its ashes. He had understood, however, that a proposition was before the Legislature of Pennsylvania to ascertain under what influences the new charter was obtained. It might aid the purposes of those who instigated that investigation, that a clamor should be raised in the House against the institution. It might be, that, by getting up a report by a select committee, distrust was to be thrown upon all similar institutions in the country. It might be that the report of such a committee, properly constituted, would promote essentially the purposes of the inquiry in Pennsylvania. The banks might be discredited, the currency discredited, paper money refused, and the golden age, so authoritatively predicted and promised, confided in. He (Mr. L.) would not say that this was the end intended to be accomplished; but this he would say, there were those who would derive a weight of influence in favor of their opinions from the appointment of the committee, more especially in the event of a certain issue to their deliberations, which it would be most difficult to withstand. He, in short, greatly feared that the mere appointment of a committee, upon such vague suggestions as the memorial contained, would throw distrust over all banking institutions, and take away that little remaining confidence which was still cherished in the soundness of the circulating medium of the country. In this point of view, the subject was certainly deserving of the most serious consideration; and, if the object proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was only as he has avowed, he would respectfully suggest that it might well be effected without giving to the most suspicious occasion for alarm. Let the gentleman accede to his (Mr. L.'s) proposed amendment to his motion, and send the memorial to the committee appointed to revise the constitution, without particular reference to the objects of these memorialists. If he will not consent to this, let him boldly assume the responsibility of the whole proposition, and offer a resolution declaring the expediency of restricting the States in the power of creating banking corporations, and be himself among the first to ask the consent of his own enlightened Commonwealth to its adoption, and the surrender of its own discretion to the dictation of Federal power. If the dangers from banks and other corporations be such as the memorial represents, this will be laying the axe to the root of the mischief; for, by the wholesome reform of denying power to the States, there will be found the most effectual protection from its abuse. The gentleman himself might be hardly yet prepared for the application of so thorough a corrective.

Mr. L. concluded by moving to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by striking out the words "a select committee," and inserting "the select committee to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to a proposed amendment to the constitution of the United States, and also petitions and resolutions presented at the last and present session, on the subject of amendments to the constitution."

Mr. HARPER of Pennsylvania said his colleague had closed his remarks by saying that this was not a party measure, nor intended to operate on the present parties of the country. I wish (said Mr. H.) I could believe this as far as respects all who are concerned in getting up this memorial and bringing it before this House. It is now, as it originally was, I have no doubt, intended to bring the character and influence of this House to bear upon this question in another body now engaged, or expected to be engaged, in an inquiry into the affairs of the United States Bank.

I shall not attempt to follow my colleague through the various ramifications and views that he has thought proper to take of this subject, but shall confine myself to the petition and such matters as necessarily grow out of it. This petition, which now seriously engages the deliberations and time of this House, is signed by twenty-eight names, not five, perhaps, of whom have the least knowledge of the operations of banking; and what do they ask? That Congress shall take into its hands and remodel the whole banking system of the United States. But, as this is not a subject which has heretofore been considered to be legitimately within the province of the official duties of Congress, I should not have adverted to it but for the purpose of showing how well those petitioners are acquainted with the subject to which they have thought proper to call the attention of this House.

Sir, my colleague has thought proper, in the course of his remarks, to comment on the depreciated state of the currency of the country. Without stopping to inquire how far he or the petitioners are correct in that respect, let us suppose that it is so, that there has a depreciation in the currency taken place. To whom, I ask, are we indebted for that depreciation? To the present administration and its supporters, among whom my colleague has been one of the most zealous. When they assumed the reins of government we had a sound, if not the very soundest, currency in the world, when it was of a mixed character of specie and paper combined. Well, sir, they set about to mend it, and how have they done it? They declared it to be their intention to give us a specie currency; instead of which, they have doubled the paper circulation, and now exclaim against and endeavor to transfer to their opponents the blame and responsibility for the evils they have brought upon the country. But it may be asked, how have the measures of the administration brought those evils upon the country? I answer by the prostration of the United States Bank, an institution which they still continue to pursue with unabated rancor because they have not been able entirely to destroy it. I may be asked in what measure were we indebted to the United States Bank for the soundness of our currency at the time the Government passed into the hands of the present administration? I answer, that that bank, considering itself a national institution, felt it to be a part of its duty, as well as its interest, to preserve a sound currency in the country as far as it possibly could, to accomplish which it voluntarily subjected itself to considerable expense and the liability of sustaining heavy losses. This desirable object it accomplished in the following manner: Whenever it found, by the quantity of paper in circulation belonging to any bank, city, or State, that an overissue had taken place, the bank collected these overissues whenever they were to be found in the possession of its debtors, returned them on the institutions which had put them into circulation, and demanded payment. If the banks thus brought in debt were unable to pay, which was often the case, the United States Bank, instead of oppressing or straitening them unnecessarily, made arrangements with them, and, by receiving a reasonable interest, gave them time to redeem their notes by gradual curtailments. Thus, sir, they were restrained within proper limits, and a wholesome currency preserved in the country, while the United States Bank ran the risk, in case a failure should take place of any bank whose notes they held, of sustaining the whole loss of the notes then in its possession. This wholesome check has been removed by the present administration and its friends, and the consequence predicted by the opposition has followed. The country has become flooded with State bank paper until the authors of the evil have themselves become alarmed, and now endeavor, by every evil and stratagem which they can invent, to transfer the odium to their opponents, who labored from the first to avert the evil.

But there is another subject which my honorable colleague and the petitioners have thought proper to bring before this House, with which, in my humble opinion, we have nothing to do. The United States Bank which was chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania during the last session of that body, is gravely charged with resisting the notes of the United States Bank, the charter of which expired last March. Well, sir, suppose they have. Had they not a right so to do? Must the present United States Bank be deprived of a privilege that belongs to every other bank and individual of the United States? Suppose the bank in possession of a quantity of the notes of the old bank, which have been received in payment of debts due to the present bank, (and I am unacquainted with any other means by which it became possessed of them,) and an individual should be not only willing, but desirous to receive these notes for a debt due from the bank to him, why should the United States Bank be deprived of the privilege of paying them out any more than any other bank or individual in the country? I know of no reason except that the bank happens to be in bad odor with the present administration of the Union and its supporters.

Sir, the paper of this wantonly and unjustly abused and vilified bank is at this moment the best paper currency in the country. There is not a gentleman within the sound of my voice, from the South or West, that does not know that this paper is anxiously sought and purchased in their sections of the country at from three to five per cent. premium. It is found to be the only paper with which they can travel through all parts of the country without being subjected to inconvenience or loss by the payment of discounts during their journey.

But another idea is thrown out, Mr. Speaker: that the circulation of these notes by the present Bank of the United States will prevent the old bank from winding up its affairs, and subject the United States, in common with the other stockholders, to the liability of losses which they would not otherwise incur. Is this the fact? If it be, I should like to be told in what manner it can happen. The notes are liable to be lost or destroyed; will that be a loss to the stockholders? I apprehend not, as they will never have to pay them if they are not presented. This will be a gain instead of a loss to the bank, and consequently an advantage to the stockholders.

But will it prevent the bank from winding up its affairs? I apprehend not, sir. It is well known that every bank keeps a record of all the notes it issues, and that it must at all times hold itself prepared to redeem them. Now, let us suppose that this bank is desirous to wind up its affairs and pay over the amount of stock and dividends due to the stockholders, and upon examination it finds that there is still a hundred thousand dollars of its notes in circulation. What, then, becomes its duty? Why, simply to set aside a hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of paying these notes as they shall be presented, and paying over to the stockholders the balance of assets which it may then possess, which is all to which they can lay any legal claim. Need I pursue this argument any further to prove that the stockholders cannot possibly lose any thing by this operation, or that the winding up of the bank need not be delayed in consequence of some of its notes being in circulation? I have never been the advocate of banks of any description; but if we must have them, and I believe such is the general sentiment of the country, then let us not carry on a war against those that are best managed, and are calculated to do most good, and nurture those from whom we have most evil to apprehend.

Sir, the objects sought to be accomplished by the petitioners cannot be effected by this House without an alteration of the constitution of the United States, or the unsettling of the whole principles upon which your Government has been administered ever since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. They ask you to take away a power which the States have always possessed—that of granting bank charters. Have you a right to deprive the States of that power without an alteration of the Constitution of the United States?

A negative to this question would, I believe, be almost unanimous throughout the Union. To what committee, then, should the petition go? I answer, to the committee already appointed, which has in charge the various amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States. If you send it to a select committee, what will be the object, and what have we to expect? A report that will contradict the assertion of my colleague, "that this is not a party measure, or intended for party purposes." You, sir, I predict, if you get a report at all, will get one of a most decided partisan character. Sir, I had no intention when I came in, of saying a word on this subject, and regret that I have detained the House so long.

Mr. MANN of New York said he had no idea, when he stated on yesterday that he wished to have his friend from Pennsylvania gratified in his request, that this subject would create a debate taking so wide a range as that which the House had witnessed; and it was no part of his purpose now to extend it much further. He had perceived, however, a disposition in the House to become early possessed of some subject worthy of debate in that body, on which to hang speeches for the edification of the public. Mr. M. said he had not deemed this of such general interest, although he would admit its intrinsic importance; and he expressed the hope that the standing committees of the House would very soon be able to present to its consideration, and for its action, the important measures of the session. These he deemed were, the reduction of the revenue to the wants of the Government—the restriction of the sales of the public lands to actual settlers—the maintenance of our neutrality towards belligerent nations, more especially towards Mexico and Texas, and the annual necessary appropriations for the support of Government. When these subjects are before the House, honorable gentlemen will have a field wide enough to exercise their highest powers. The House would recollect (said Mr. M.) that his friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. Galbraith) had heretofore made some efforts to bring the subject of this petition before it and before the country, in which he had not been as successful as he (Mr. M.) thought he deserved. That gentleman had not often asked the House for favors of any kind; he had been as modest in that respect as most gentlemen representing the people on that floor. Mr. M. said he understood that his friend who presented this petition, felt a deep interest in the subject, because the Bank of the United States of the State of Pennsylvania had established, or were about establishing, a branch of that institution in the district which he represented; and Mr. M. thought it but right that the gentleman should have an opportunity, as chairman of a select committee, to resist what he deemed an encroachment upon the rights of his constituents, by a great moneyed power. He desired, also, at the same time, to resist the extension of the paper system—of paper money, whether under the Federal or State authorities, by an examination of the subject in reference to the spirit of our institutions. To this Mr. M. saw no well founded objection, because it was not proposed by the petitioners, or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to apply the powers of this Government to remedy the present evils; but to strike at the root, by considering the expediency of amending the constitution, so as to prohibit the States, by their own consent, from granting banking privileges and profits by their legislation to one class of their citizens, (under the pretence of the public good,) which, in the nature of things, must be denied to all others. Sir, (said Mr. M.) has not the paper system of this country extended itself far enough, identifying itself with all the interests of society in every department of trade, devouring the productive labor of those who submit to the laws of Heaven, and procure their bread by the sweat of their brows? Why is it, sir, that for the last ten or fifteen years the community has been kept almost constantly in a feverish condition respecting the currency, rendering their property and their productive labor insecure by changing the standard of value, or rather destroying it? Has it not been principally owing to the fluctuations in our paper system, sometimes swelling itself like the full tides of the ocean, and then suddenly receding, carrying its thoughtless and careless votaries to the dark abodes of devouring avarice?

What is a proper remedy for this? asked Mr. M. Why the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just resumed his seat, (Mr. Harper,) finds it in a Bank of the United States to regulate the issues of the subordinate factories, by driving their products home, and substituting their own, which, he believes, is the very best currency in the world. This remedy, sir, has usually increased the disease. Instead of regulating, restraining, or controlling the paper issues by the State banks, it has increased them by the addition of its own issues falling into their vaults as capital. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) supposes that it is a libel upon the people, to even entertain the idea of restraining the paper system in its operation, and does not seem willing to treat this petition with common respect. There are, sir, (said Mr. M.) those in the State which in part he had the honor to represent, as well as in Massachusetts, who maintain that the greater part of the blessings vouchsafed from God to man, come through a bank under their control. It has, however, been doubted there, by some, whether those blessings are not shaved and diminished before they effect the purposes designed by the Great Giver. This is no the case, (Mr. M. presumed) with the the constituency of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and therefore he is clear that things are blessings to them, which are esteemed evils by most all others. Mr. M. said he could here make answer to the several positions assumed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, which he trusted would be satisfactory, but he had already occupied the House much longer than he intended when he arose, and he could not deem it necessary or useful to detain it longer for such purpose. He hoped the petition would receive the same respect which was usually accorded to those which were in respectful terms.

Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island was under the impression that, at the last session, this memorial was referred to one of the standing committees of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Galbraith) takes it from the files in the clerk's office, and again presents it to our consideration, because, for want of time, or from some other cause, it was not finally disposed of at a former session. Why (said Mr. P.) should it now receive a different direction? What has transpired to require this? Because it did not receive the action of a committee at a former session, it did not follow that it would not receive such action at the present session. To refer it now to a select committee, would not, perhaps, be a direct censure upon one of the standing committees of the House; but he would submit to gentlemen, whether it would be paying that deference and respect to a standing committee it was entitled to. To such a committee it legitimately belonged, and I (said Mr. P.) am not disposed to gratify my friend from Pennsylvania, or any other man, to take from committees what belongs to them. I have taken my stand upon this subject, and my friend from Pennsylvania will understand that it is not to oppose him that I object to his motion, but to maintain a consistency in my own course of legislation. Heretofore select committees were not ordered as a matter of course, never without good cause; and not always when, in the opinion of many gentlemen, there has been good cause. Such has been the temper of the House in regard to them, and such has been the tenacity with which those who composed the standing committees of the House clung to what belonged to them. I regret to say, that, at this session, there have been already appointed more select committees than I had ever before known during a whole session of the House.

I will for a moment examine the effect which will be produced by, and the consequences which will follow, the too frequent appointment of these select committees. One member wants a subject referred to a select committee, which is proper for the consideration of one of the standing committees of the House, because he, as the chairman of that committee, can have it under his special care, will be able to present it to the House in a fair light, and more speedily, for its action thereon. Well, sir, this, in the estimation of some gentlemen, may be all well enough; but, are they prepared to say that one member shall have, by concession and the indulgence of the House, what shall be denied to another? If not, sir, then where, and in what situation do we find ourselves? Every thing which any member has in charge must go, or certainly may go, to a select committee. Your standing committees may be ousted of their jurisdiction, and might as well be abolished at one time as at another.

There is withal a little right, and a little justice, involved in this consideration. Is it right, is it just, that an interest should be committed to those who are known, in advance, to be in favor of it? I think not; as you may not, in such a case have that full investigation, and that fair and impartial representation, which may be had of one of the standing committees of the House.

For an illustration of my views I will (said Mr. P.) recur to what has taken place at this session, not to arraign the presiding officer of the House, who has, I know, done no more than conform to usage and the course of those who have preceded him, but to show the consequences of an order for a select committee. An honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. Hawes,) with an avowed hostility and opposition to the military school at West Point, honest and sincere, I have no doubt, in his convictions of the inutilty of that institution, submits a proposition and inquiry which involve, or may involve, the further continuance of that institution, and prays for a select committee. Such a committee is ordered, consisting of nine members, and it is found that of the nine, seven are friendly to the proposition submitted by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and unfriendly to the institution, and but two are the friends of the same.

I complain not of this, as the select committee was ordered, because it was organized according to the usages of the House, existing in the organization of such committees; but I do, Mr. Speaker, derive from it an argument, and I hope the House will see the full force of it, against the too frequent appointment of select committees.

I have often witnessed a spirit which well become them, evinced by those who are the heads of standing committees in this House, to claim all that belonged to them. I hope I shall see further manifestations of this spirit. We made at the commencement of the session a very good beginning. An honorable member from Alabama (Mr. Lewis) moved a reference to a select committee of a subject which the veteran chairman of the Committee of Claims clearly showed belonged to that committee; and by a very large vote of the House, the select committee was denied, and the subject was referred to the standing committee, of which the honorable gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Whittlesey) is chairman. Why was this done? There was a general disposition on the part of the House, I have no doubt, to gratify the gentleman from Alabama; but it could not be done, without a violation of our own rules, and encroaching upon the rights of a standing committee of the House.

But what, Mr. Speaker, are we called upon to do by these gentlemen memorialists, twenty-eight in number, comprising, I hope not, all the virtue and intelligence, purity of purpose, and integrity of character, yet remaining in the State of Pennsylvania? They complain of the increasing issues of bank paper money by incorporated companies in the different States; they wish Congress to inquire into the expediency of proposing an amendment to the constitution, restricting the incorporation of banks by the several States; they say that the notes of the Bank of the United States, which had been returned to the bank for redemption, and redeemed, had been re-issued since the fourth of March last, when the charter of the Bank of the United States expired, and they pray, generally, for relief in the premises.

When (said Mr. P.) men are in mud and mire so deep, that they cannot, in their opinions, extricate themselves without calling on their friends, it has been generally thought to be necessary for them to show, before they receive the required aid, that the proper effort on their part has been made. Sir, can we confer upon these honest men any aid which they may not have and enjoy, independently of any action on our part? What says the constitution of the United States upon one of the subjects referred to us for our consideration by these twenty-eight men? "Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments," &c. I would say, sir, to those honorable men, why is not this good work begun at home? Do not yet call on Hercules, for you have not yet shown that you have done all you were able to do.

I may be told that the Legislature of Pennsylvania is corrupt, and an appeal to that body would be an ineffectual one. Then I would say, appeal to the ballot box; and if, perchance, I should be told that even there the proper relief could not be had, I would say to the people of Pennsylvania, adopt and carry into operation the suggestions of at least two of her Governors, Wolfe and Ritner: establish free schools, and extend the diffusion of light and science; apply all that will to you belong, under our late distribution act, for the purpose of enlightening the rising generation. I repeat, sir, let the men of Pennsylvania begin their good work at home, for, in my opinion, it does not become them to put upon record their own infamy, their bribery, and their corruption, and the influence of Mr. Biddle and his bank over them.

Sir, I am sorry that the corrupting influences of the man or his bank are brought to our view: let every man have his due. Mr. B. says that he was quite indifferent about a re-charter, by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, of the Bank of the United States. He made no application for a re-charter; he neither corrupted nor seduced any one; that if any rapacious act was committed, it was by the Legislature upon him, and not by him upon them; and one would suppose from his first letter addressed to my venerable friend from Massachusetts, that there would not have been any violence of any kind, but for the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Legislature. Surely, sir, these twenty-eight men do not wish us to save them from their own worst enemies, themselves.

It is, has long been, a mooted point, and I think it will long remain so, whether Congress, under the constitution, can in any way restrain or restrict the issues of bank paper by local banks. Deposit banks can be compelled to perform what they are bound by contract with the Treasury Department to do, and here I think the matter must end. I am not now prepared to say that Congress can, as the constitution now is, say to any State in this Union, "You shall incorporate so many and no more banking institutions, and the issues of those incorporated shall be to such an extent as we may prescribe, and not beyond." Sir, I am not a very great stickler for State rights: at any rate I have not said so much in favor of them as many others have said, but this I do say, that I am ready, and as well prepared as any man can be, to resist all encroachments upon State sovereignties, let them come from whatever quarter they may, and act, when there shall be an attempt here to restrain the Legislature of the State from which I come, in what we deem to be the lawful exercise of its powers, whether in incorporating banking institutions, or any other institutions, that attempt will be fairly met, not by me alone, and will be properly resisted. We are not yet driven to the necessity of declaring to the world our own infamy, and begging Congress, because we are corrupt, to take us under its protection, to act for us and pass laws to restrain us in our infamous and corrupt course.

Sir, let it not be inferred from what I have said that I am in favor of the moneyed incorporations of the country. No, sir, I am opposed to them, and all other incorporations; and as I now am, I always have been, and I verily believe I shall continue to be. What are they but additional facilities for the rich to oppress the poor, and, in their march to do it, to travel with steam power? for an irresponsible body, without soul, to do what no man, as an individual, with heart or soul, ever did, or ever will do—to steal power from the many, to whom it belongs, and confer it upon the few, who never ought to have it, and clothe that few with the full possession and exercise of it? Sir, upon this subject I have nothing to disguise. I here avow my sentiments as I have avowed them elsewhere, and I stand or fall by them here and every where.

Sir, it may be very questionable whether power can be met by, or resisted by, any thing but power; and whether there is strength enough, if there be virtue and integrity sufficient, in the people of this country to meet or put down what may be called the major vis—the money power, and the corporation power—except by meeting it with its own weapons, and opposing to it a force not unlike that which it wields. The people of my own State, (said Mr. P.) one would suppose, have gone upon this principle; that is to say, to meet power of a certain kind, by the exercise against it of a power of the like kind. Finding themselves in the incorporation of bank institutions, "stepped in so far, that returning would be as bad as to go o'er," they are now, from necessity, to keep in a sound, healthy, state, institutions created; obliged to create all that are asked for, that one may operate as a check to, and counteract the evil tendencies and effect of the other.

Mr. Speaker, the Bank of the United States recently chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, is a creature of Pennsylvania. As we all take our wives, let them take that, for better and for worse, and not trouble us about bribery and corruption. If they have been bribed, or felt the corrupting influence of money, the sooner they are in a state which will enable them to resist the one or the other, the better for them. I thought at the last session, when we with great unanimity repealed one of the sections in the charter of the late Bank of the United States, which, in the opinions of some men, was operative, notwithstanding the expiration of the charter itself; operative so far as to compel receiving officers to receive the bills of that bank, in the payment of Government dues, we should not hear in the form of direct communications, any thing more of the monster, and nothing more would be said of it, and nothing more would be done in regard to it, until we took the proper steps to make it disgorge what it had belonging to us. I have been mistaken.

In conclusion, said Mr. P. when in order to make that motion, I will move; and if now in order, will now move that this memorial be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DENNY of Pennsylvania said he rose to trouble the House with a remark or two, in consequence of the extraordinary ground taken by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Mann.) I had supposed, from the motion made by that gentleman on yesterday, that his object was to submit at large some cogent and satisfactory arguments for indulging my colleague (Mr. Galbraith) with a select committee. He has not done this, however, and the only reason he has urged amounts to this: that it is apprehended some change may take place in the opinions of the constituents of my colleague; therefore, the power of this House must be exercised to counteract it.

He says there is a special reason for granting the motion of my colleague, which is, that the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States is about to establish a branch in the district represented by my colleague, and this select committee is desired, in order "to resist this encroachment on the principles of his (Mr. Galbraith's) constituents, by this moneyed power." I presume it is known to most gentlemen on this floor that the bank chartered by Pennsylvania has established a branch at the town of Erie, in the county of Erie, and within the district represented by my colleague.

But, sir, this branch was authorized by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and I believe at the special instance and request of the constituents of my colleague. It was on the motion of the gentleman who represented the people of Erie county in the Legislature that the authority was given to establish this branch. It did not proceed from any spontaneous movement of the bank itself. This is termed an encroachment on "the principles of the constituents of my colleague." And because the gentleman imagines this measure may produce a change in the opinions of many of the constituents of my colleague, and cause them to differ from him, therefore we must interpose the power of this House to prevent it. We are called on to interfere with the opinions of the people, where it is supposed they may differ from those entertained by their representative here. Carry out the argument, the same reason would justify our interfering with the press. And gentlemen might with equal propriety call for the power of this House to be exercised to put down a press established in his district, because it might produce a change in the opinions or principles of his constituents. The doctrine is alarming, and claims for this House a power which I cannot concede to it.

If my colleague has views peculiar to himself on the subjects mentioned in the memorial, and which he thinks important, and worthy of being made public, the press is open to him; he can freely communicate them through that channel. But I cannot agree that this House should lend its sanction to the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from New York.

If any disposition is to be made of the memorial, I have no great objection to sending the first branch of it to the committee indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Yet I think the whole had better be laid on the table.

This memorial was gotten up last year at a period of political excitement. The Presidential election was approaching, and something was to be effected. That contest is now over, and this memorial might well have been left on the files of the House. So much of it as relates to an amendment of the constitution, I am willing should be referred to the committee already having charge of propositions for that purpose.

With regard to the second part of the memorial, I am opposed to any reference whatever. In this part of the memorial we are called upon to interfere with a State institution. And for what reason? Because the bank chartered by Pennsylvania has received and paid out notes formerly put into circulation by the Bank of the United States, chartered by Congress. Has not every bank a right to do this? The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States is distinct from the old Bank of the United States; they have different individuals as their presiding officers. Your power extends to the bank chartered by Congress; but you have no right to go into an examination of the affairs of the institution established by Pennsylvania; it is a State institution, not amenable to you, and over which you have no control. Large as are the powers of this House, they can extend only to those institutions connected with this Government. That established by Pennsylvania is beyond your jurisdiction, and exclusively within the jurisdiction of that State, and we cannot interfere with it.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, remarked that the memorial offered by his colleague (Mr. Galbraith) presented for the consideration of the House subjects of general as well as local interest—subjects that have elicited discussion, and will elicit more. In this memorial is asked an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in matters not affecting a portion of the people, or one part of the country, but an amendment that is to control the action and legislation of the State Legislature and State authorities of all the States composing the Government, in relation to banking institutions and other corporations.

Another branch of this memorial proposes an investigation of the acts and proceedings of a Pennsylvania State institution, created and maintained by State authority; and the question now before the House, and which is the subject of discussion, is the reference or disposition to be made of this memorial, for which the mover asks a select committee to be raised.

It is to be considered whether it is deserving of a reference to any committee, from the character of the memorial, and the circumstances under which it is got up and presented. This memorial, signed by twenty-eight citizens of Pennsylvania, was presented at the last session of Congress, and, by a vote of this House, was laid on the table, where it was allowed to rest. It has, however, been raised from the tomb of the Capulets, to which it was supposed to be consigned, and again brought before the House by my colleague.

It has already performed its office: it was presented to the last Congress by him, with such remarks as he chose to make, and he has been allowed the opportunity of again presenting it, and making his remarks. This is enough, and as much probably as was expected, or ought to have been expected, for such a memorial.

It is, however, now asked and pressed that a select committee shall be raised for the special purpose of considering this memorial. It is unreasonable that a select committee should be formed and charged under the direction of this House with considering certain proposed amendments to the Constitution, limiting State authority and State legislation in all the States, and abridging the rights of the people from one end of the Union to the other, on the application of 28 petitioners from one State, whose memorial had been presented to the last Congress, and by a vote of the House laid on the table, without a reference to any committee. Without any fresh memorial from the people; without any indication of public sentiment on the part of the people on this subject of general interest, this House is asked to give my colleague, on this sleeping memorial, a select committee, to consider and report amendments of the Constitution that shall restrain and limit State jurisdiction and legislation. It will lead to no amendment, nor will it lead to any legislation by this House, and it ought not to receive the attention that would seem to be given to it by raising a select committee. The most proper disposition of this memorial would be such as was given it at the last session—by laying it on the table.

But, sir, if it is to have a reference to a committee, that portion of it which relates to the amendment of the constitution should be referred to the select committee some time since appointed, and to which the various propositions in relation to the amendment of the constitution have already been referred. It would be appropriate for that committee to consider this, and other amendments that may be proposed. Is this House going to set the precedent of indulging every set of petitioners, be their numbers great or small, with a select committee to consider their projects? If this be established as the rule and practice of this House, these memorials will multiply on our hands much, with various schemes of amendment, and we shall have as many projected amendments, and as many select committees, as there are articles in the constitution. Let us set no such precedent; but, if the House will give it a reference, let it be made to a committee already selected having charge of the subject.

But another part of this memorial relates to the acts and proceedings of a State bank in Pennsylvania. It is complained that the Pennsylvania United States Bank, in its business transactions, uses, to a certain extent, some of the bank notes of the late United States Bank. Whether it does or does not, whether it is right or wrong in this, and whether it be authorized or prohibited, are questions and matters with which this House has nothing to do; they belong to the people of Pennsylvania. It is a State institution, created by State authority, and amenable to our State judiciary and State Legislature for the abuses of its powers, if they be abused.

Our State tribunals are fully competent to take care of our State institutions and protect our citizens, without the interference of this House, in a matter of which it has no cognizance or jurisdiction; and if it does interfere, it is by encroaching on State rights, and usurping power and authority which does not belong to it.

By whom is it that this House is asked to inquire into a subject belonging to the courts and Legislature of Pennsylvania? It is on the memorial of 28 petitioners from Pennsylvania, out of a population of one million and a half; a memorial not now emanating from the people, complaining of any existing or recent grievance or abuse, but raised up from the old files of the House, where it was supposed to be buried. Is this all that is required to induce the House to take Pennsylvania under its charge, and assume to do what belongs to the people of Pennsylvania and her State authorities? Against any such interference or assumption of power, as one of the representatives of Pennsylvania I protest.

But, sir, we are told by the honorable member from New York, (Mr. Mann,) in more than a whisper, that there is a special reason and propriety in indulging my colleague with a select committee, as he understood that this State bank was about to locate a branch in the district of my colleague; and as my honorable colleague (Mr. Galbraith) was sitting near the member from New York, he may take this as his suggestion. It was further alleged as a reason for the interference of the House to make the inquiry, that the proposed branch of the State bank might, it was apprehended, corrupt the people of that district.

The location of a branch of this State bank in that district is a question of policy, expediency, and power, for the consideration of the People and Legislature of Pennsylvania. It belongs exclusively to them and the bank, and they can and will settle the question for themselves. This House has no jurisdiction or power over it.

If the location of the branch in the district of my colleague is a grievance, tending to corrupt the People, and they are opposed to it, how is it, out of a population of fifty thousand and more in that district, it should be left to these twenty-eight petitioners to take care of the interests of the people of that district, and to manifest their opposition?

Such considerations, thus supported, ought not to influence this House in assuming to legislate on a subject out of their power and jurisdiction, and within the power and cognizance alone of State authority.

It cannot, I think, be seriously expected that there will be any legislation by this House on this memorial; and as the whole subject is one calculated to produce discussion, create excitement, rouse party feelings, and consume time, without leading to any practical legislation, I move to lay the memorial, &c. on the table.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he was surprised that so much sensibility had been discovered by gentlemen on account of the introduction of the petition now under consideration. It stated no new, no unknown grievance; it proposed no very strange or unreasonable remedy. It proceeded on the assumption that gold and silver was the legal and constitutional currency of this country; and that in the place of gold and silver the country was now inundated with a miserable paper currency, continually expanding and expanding until we were threatened with an explosion, most terrible and overwhelming. And was there not much force in the views which the petitioners took? Was it not true that the expansion of the paper system had, within the last three years, been most alarming and unprecedented? Was it not true that by this means a false and pernicious value had been given to every thing, so that the poor man's dollar now would not buy more than fifty cents would secure for him four years ago? From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury the House would see that since the first day of January, 1834, the paper money of the country had increased from seventy-six millions to more than one hundred and twenty millions of dollars, while within the last two years one hundred and six new banks had been created, with capitals amounting to more than SIXTY MILLIONS OF DOLLARS, and about thirteen millions of dollars had been added to the capitals of old banks. Many millions of banking capital have been added since the report of the Secretary was made; and yet was it not true that "the appetite of bank applicants seemed to increase with what it fed on?" Was there any prospect of satiating or gorging them? Did not this state of things give cause for alarm to the calm sober thinker and the patriot? He was not prepared to say that he was disposed altogether, or all at once, to dispense with, or put down, the paper system. Such a scheme, with the hope of carrying it immediately into execution, would, perhaps, be as utopian as the rapid and continuing expansion of your paper system was alarming. It was necessary to deal with this subject with the spirit of practical statesmen, not with the dogmatical temper of stiff and stern theorists, who, after brooding over their favorite theory for years, until it becomes a sort of monomania, would hazard the most sudden and convulsing remedies, to carry it into practical execution. It was not always wise to lose at once all respect for things that are, in order to bring about things that ought to be. Gradual alternatives were oftentimes better than violent remedies, which racked the system to death. He had within the last three years (he spoke with much deference) heard the constitutional currency of the country too often stigmatized with the dignified appellation of "gold humbug." Yet it had often occurred to him that the feeling which dictated such opprobrious ebullitions, found some extenuation in the impracticable schemes which some of us entertained; in the belief that we could, and should, with one bold dash, rid the country of your one hundred and twenty or thirty millions of paper currency, and supply its place with a sufficiency of gold and silver for the various ramifications of the business of this vast and enterprising country. Yes, while there seemed to be those who believed that a paper currency, however expanded, was harmless, there were others who seemed to suppose that we could at once repudiate the whole paper system, and usher in a "golden age," without producing a revolution, too serious to contemplate. It behoved us, if we were indeed intent upon doing something that was salutary, to avoid such extremes. The crisis called for a remedy from some quarter against a too expanded and continually expanding paper currency; and if here was the place where the cure was to originate, a responsibility had indeed devolved upon the wise doctors here assembled, that should put in requisition all their skill and all their wisdom.

He had remarked that the petition represented to us an evil, as to the existence of which all gentlemen concurred, viz: the alarming multiplication of banks by the States, and the danger which your expanded and expanding paper system portended; but while all concurred in the existence of the evil, there was much diversity of opinion in regard to the remedy. Many gentlemen here supposed that a natural and an excellent remedy was already within our constitutional reach—that a national bank was the best regulator of the currency, the grand panacea by which the whole feverish monetary system was at once to be restored to stability and health. There was another class of gentlemen, who believe that the power to create this alleged remedy was not conferred on us by the constitution; and if it had been delegated to us, it was, at best, one of those desperate remedies, that was worse than the disease. Another class of gentlemen believed that the remedy was to be found in a section of the Federal Constitution, which prohibits the States "from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender." The petitioners seemed to assume this position, and evidently desired a declaratory amendment of the constitution, indicating unequivocally, that this section of the constitution includes a prohibition against the States to make or emit paper money through the medium of incorporated banks. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Lincoln) had denounced this position as preposterous. It was not necessary for the purpose of the subject immediately under discussion, that he (Mr. V.) should contend that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was wrong in the view which he took of this point, and that the petitioners were "right;" but after their sense of the true meaning of the constitution had been so emphatically denounced, if not ridiculed by the honorable gentleman, it was at least due to the petitioners to say, that they had very high authority for the construction which they seemed to give that clause of the constitution which prohibits the States from emitting bills of credit, or from making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender! an authority which the gentleman from Massachusetts himself would be disposed to respect. Mr. Madison, in the forty-fourth number of the Federalist, in commenting upon that section of the constitution which prohibits the States from coining money, emitting bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver a lawful tender, remarks as follows:

"The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen, in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilential effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man, on the necessary confidence in the public councils, on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of republican government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unwise measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather, an accumulation of guilt which can be expiated no other wise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed, that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin, prove with equal force that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. Had every State a right to regulate the value of its coin, there might be as many different currencies as States, and thus the intercourse between them would be impeded; retrospective alterations in its value might be made, and thus the citizens of other States be injured, and animosities be kindled among the States themselves. The subjects of foreign powers might suffer from the same course, and hence the Union be discredited and embroiled by the indiscretion of a single member. No one of these mischiefs is less incident to a power in the States to emit paper money than to coin gold and silver. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, is withdrawn from the States on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

Sir, (said Mr. V.) here is a contemporaneous exposition of one section of the constitution, from the pen of one who had well been denominated "the author and finisher of the constitution." This was enough, at all events, to have saved the petitioners from the denunciations which their view of the sense and meaning of one clause of the constitution had here encountered; and should, perhaps, have commanded a little more respect for the remedy they propose for the evils upon which they dwell. He was free to say, that if this clause of the constitution, prohibiting the States from issuing bills of credit, included a prohibition on the authority of the States to make paper money, through the medium of incorporated banks, it might at this day, for any such purpose, be regarded as a dead letter. The States had, for more than forty years, exercised the power of incorporating banks with power to issue notes; and if the original exercise of this power was founded in usurpation and error, (which he would not here fully discuss,) it was, at all events, an error so old and so general as to have acquired the authority of right and law. According to one of the maxims of the common law, "Communis error facit jus," and it would be expecting, if not asking too much, to suppose that, after the long exercise of this power by the States and the general acquiescence of the people therein, the judicial tribunals of the country would now give a practical interpretation to the above clause of the constitution, in accordance with the view of Mr. Madison. If it were right and proper then, that there should be some regulating means by which this power of the States could be restricted within reasonable limits, was not the prayer of the petitioners a reasonable one, proposing a feasible object? and did not their petition deserve from us most respectful, if not most serious, consideration? Mr. V. said, he would repeat his surprise at the fact, that some gentlemen had discussed this petition, as if it were so monstrous as not to be entitled even to common courtesy at our hands; but his surprise was somewhat diminished, when he reflected, that this petition proposed a means of regulating the currency, other than that which was to be found in the fiat of a board of bank directors convened in Philadelphia.

Having deemed it pertinent to say what he had said, as to the nature, scope and object of the petition, he would add a word as to the disposition that should be made of it. It had been remarked by one gentleman, that it ought to be referred to one of the standing committees of this House, and particularly to that committee which was appointed upon that portion of the President's message that related to amendments to the constitution. It surely did not fairly come within the jurisdiction of that committee, because that was a select committee appointed to take cognizance of a particular subject; an amendment of the constitution, so far as it regards the election of President and Vice President. [Here Mr. Lincoln interrupted Mr. V. and said that he thought the resolution appointing that select committee was broad enough to include all amendments to the constitution that might be proposed, and called for the reading of the resolution.] Mr. V. said, that the resolution was obviously retrospective, not prospective; it related merely to propositions pending before the House at the time of its passage, and could not be construed to comprehend future propositions, relating to subjects other than the election of President and Vice President; and while he was up, he would take occasion to say a word about this select committee, annually, and for many years past, appointed to consider the proposed amendments to the constitution; and, in what he was about to say, he certainly could mean no personal disrespect to that committee; for it had been his good or ill fortune last year, and now again, to be an humble member of it, and to be associated with pure and most enlightened gentlemen. It might, nevertheless, be called a "humbug committee," year after year deliberating over the crude propositions of gentlemen to amend the constitution; year after year reporting to the House some sage plan, but never yet, to his knowledge, (no doubt from the nature of the subject,) coming to any conclusion that obtained the sanction of this House; whatever the cause, it seemed to be a body that produced no available fruit.

Another gentleman had remarked that this subject properly belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means. For his part, he could not see the remotest connection between a proposition to amend the constitution in a particular of this description, and the duty of raising ways and means for the support of the Government; nor could he imagine any good reason for referring the petition to the Judiciary Committee, for it embraced an object that rose far above the ordinary range of the duties of your Committee on the Judiciary. He was for referring it to a select committee, who, appreciating its importance, would feel all becoming responsibility, and give us the result of calm, patient, and enlightened deliberation. He had felt it due to the petitioners, and to the subject of their petition, to submit these remarks, and, more especially, since, from the tenor of the remarks of some gentlemen, they seemed to consider the presentation of this petition to us very extraordinary, if not insolent.

Mr. EVERETT of Vermont, said he had voted against laying the petition on the table, and should vote for its reference to a select committee; and he desired, in a few words, to give the reason for this course. The question derived all its importance from the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Galbraith.) The petition, in itself, was deserving of but little consideration; it was got up during the last session, under particular circumstances, and for a particular object, not now requiring the action of the House; nor was there any evidence that the petitioners desired its consideration; but it had been adopted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as the occasion of his motion for a special committee. It was therefore entitled to the same consideration as a resolution asking for an inquiry would be. He did not consider this motion as having been made merely on the responsibility of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but as having been made on consultation in concert with the friends of the present, or, rather, coming administration. For a long time the public had been entertained with general and vague propositions in relation to the currency. For one, he was desirous that the administration should have an opportunity, and one that could not be evaded, of laying before the country its specific view and plans on this subject.

He hoped a committee entirely favorable to its views should be raised, that its distinct plans might be laid before the country. If there was any settled plan, he wished to know it. He wished for something more than non-committal. If it was intended to make war on the power of the States to incorporate banks, the sooner it was known the better. If the plan of a specie currency was to be adopted, he wished to be informed how it was to be effected; he wished to see some practical plan proposed; he wished to give the administration an opportunity to show their head. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Vanderpoel) had assigned, unintentionally probably, a reason why it should be referred to the committee raised on amendments to the constitution. He had styled that committee a humbug committee, and it would seem to follow that this subject might, with great propriety, be referred to that committee; but he has assigned a sufficient reason why it should not be referred to that committee. He said, that I agree with him, that that committee was not appointed with a view to this particular subject. Let a committee, then, be appointed with a view to this subject—a committee that will fully expose the views of the administration; let us have their definite plans; something responsible. It is of immense importance, not only to the commercial interest, but to the country at large, that the questions in relation to the currency should be settled.

Mr. EVERETT having concluded his remarks, Mr. HANNegan called for the previous question, which the House seconded—yeas 85, nays 75.

Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina called for the yeas and nays on the question of taking the main question; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Barton, Beale, Black, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Bunch, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Davis, Doubleday, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Fowler, French, Fry, Fuller, Galbraith, James Garland, Gillet, Glascock, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hannegan, A. G. Harrison, Henderson, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingham, Jarvis, Joseph Johnson, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Kennon, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Lane, Laporte, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, William Mason, Moses Mason, McCarty, McKim, McLene, Miller, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Parks, Patterson, Franklin Pierce, Dutee J. Pearce, Phelps, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Ripley, Schenck, Seymour, Shields, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Speight, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Turner, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, Thomas T. Whittlesey, and Yell—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chetwood, Childs, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Deberry, Denny, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Forester, Graham, Granger, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Harlan, Harper, S. S. Harrison, Hazeltine, Heister, Hoar, Howell, Jones, Jenifer, Henry Johnson, Lawler, Lawrence, Lay, Luke Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Sampson Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, Mercer, Pearson, Pettigrew, Peyton, Philips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Robertson, Rogers, Russell, Augustine H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Steele, Storer, Talaffero, Waddy Thompson, Underwood, Vinton, Washington, White, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, and Young—84.

So the House determined that the main question be now put, being the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. EVERETT asked that the question might be taken first on that portion of the memorial which related to the proposed amendment to the constitution; and, secondly, on that portion relative to the issue by the Bank of Pennsylvania of the old notes of the United States Bank, and the division was ordered.

And the main question being on the commitment of the first portion of the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means, was taken, and decided in the negative.

And the second portion of the main question being on the commitment of the second part of the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means, was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to commit the memorial to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question then recurred on committing the first portion of the memorial to a select committee, as moved by Mr. GALBRAITH; which motion prevailed.

And the question was then taken on committing the second portion of the memorial to the said select committee; and was decided in the affirmative.

So the memorial was referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members.

[The committee consists of the following gentlemen: Messrs. GALBRAITH of Pennsylvania; FRIGHT of North Carolina; EVERETT, of Vermont; Mason, of Maine; LINCOLN of Massachusetts; MAXX of New York; JENIFER of Maryland; HOLSEY of Georgia; and CRAIG of Virginia.]

REMARKS OF MR. DUNLAP, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, Jan. 3, 1837—On the resolution proposing an inquiry into the condition of the Executive Departments.

Mr. DUNLAP said he regretted the necessity there was for him to occupy the time of the House on this question, but from the remarks that had just fallen from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens,) he felt it a duty he owed to the Executive, as one of the Representatives from Tennessee, to answer some of the remarks of the honorable gentleman, and to correct him as to some of the facts he had stated. The gentleman from South Carolina has charged Gen. Jackson with dictating to the American people who should be his successor, and by bargain, intrigue, and corruption, to have actually made the American people vote for and elect his successor. To prove these premises to be true, the gentleman has referred to a public speech made by an honorable Senator from Tennessee, (Judge White,) in which the President is charged of having proposed to make the honorable Senator Vice President, if he would not run for the Presidency. Mr. D. said the honorable gentleman has also referred to the speech of his honorable colleague, (Mr. Peyton,) made a few days since in this House, in which the President is charged with interfering with the elections in Tennessee, and abusing a portion of the Representatives from that State. Mr. D. said he had it from the mouth of the President, that he never made such a proposition as the one mentioned in Judge White's speech; and that he never said that one of his colleagues, (Mr. Shields,) was of no account, and that his constituents ought to send some one that was of some account; nor did he ever say that another of his colleagues (Mr. Huntsman) was on the fence, and no one knows which side he will fall. These charges the President pronounces to be false. Now, sir, said Mr. D. if the premises of the gentleman from South Carolina are erroneous, his conclusions must necessarily be so.

Mr. D. said the administration of President Jackson had been more violently attacked than that of any other President. The opposition to it had made charge after charge against it; and no doubt often without knowing whether they were true or false; and they had misrepresented what the President had said about persons who had always supported his administration, to make them his enemies, and thus get them to give publicity to those charges. Mr. D. said he regretted very much that either of his colleagues should have thought it necessary for them to make the charges they did against the Executive. He was the adopted son of Tennessee; he had spent a life from boyhood to where he now lies, on a bed of sickness, in the service of his country; he has often led the sons of Tennessee to victory and glory, and has gained for himself and his favorite Tennessee imperishable renown. Mr. D. said he should have felt that he had done injustice to the President, to his constituents, to his State, and to his country, if he had kept his seat, and had not given the House the information he had.

He said he was a native Tennessean, and proud of the name; that he was at all times ready to defend the character of his State or her sons; for it is the character of the public servant that gives character to the States. In detracting from the character of General Jackson, you detract from the character of the State. Sir, (said Mr. D.) General Jackson has given to the State of Tennessee more character than any of her other citizens. Mr. D. said he knew full well that great efforts had been made to get Tennessee in opposition to the President, but that could never be done. Tennesseans were governed by principle. Although a majority of them differed with the President as to who should be the successor, they were not opposed to him or to his administration. Mr. D. said he was opposed to the election of Mr. Van Buren, and in favor of his colleague, (Judge White.) He was for him for his worth and merit, but he was not prepared to take the course of the gentleman from South Carolina, who had declared open and uncompromising war against the next administration. Sir, (said Mr. D.) how does that gentleman know what will be the principles upon which the next President will administer this Government? Mr. Van Buren has been elected by a majority of the States and a majority of the people; and it is to be presumed that he will administer it on the good old republican principles; and if so, he should most unquestionably support his administration. He would not oppose or support any administration, but upon principle.

Mr. D. said he would now say a few words to the friends of the administration. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise,) had preferred a general charge against the Executive officers of this administration, and asked that a committee might be appointed to examine all of them. Mr. D. said, he hoped no friend of the administration would shrink from this general investigation. We now had it in our power to silence the slang of the enemies of the administration for ever, by letting them go and examine all the officers, and if there has been any frauds or corruptions in any of them, let the brand of infamy be fixed on them, and let the country and all future administrations know they are unworthy to be trusted. We know, (said Mr. D.) and the American people know, that it is impossible for the President to know all the persons he has to appoint to office, and that he has to depend on his friends for information, and, in some instances, he may have been imposed on, and unworthy men recommended to him. If there are any such, let them be hunted out, and their crimes made known to this House and the whole American people.

Mr. D. said, if any amendment should be adopted, it would give the enemies of the administration an opportunity of saying they were limited in their inquiries, and that the administration was afraid of a general investigation. As one of the friends of the administration (Mr. D. said) he was for the broadest inquiry, and he would vote for the inquiry in the way they desired it, that there should be no excuse that they were limited.

In reply to Mr. PERRY,

Mr. DUNLAP said he had but performed a duty in saying what he had, and if he had not done it, he would have been unworthy to be the representative of the thirteenth Congressional district in Tennessee; that he performed his duty without regard of consequences to himself. He did not conceive that his colleague had any right to complain of his course, as he was but answering charges that had been made against the President, and if they were untrue, his colleague should have been gratified to learn that the President was not guilty of the charges that had been imputed to him. Mr. D. said that his colleague (Mr. Peyton) had not given his statement of what the President should have said as being made to him, but to others, and by them communicated to him. Mr. D. said it was but due to his two colleagues (Messrs. SHIELDS and HUNTERMAN) that he should have made the statement he did. Mr. D. said he had called to see the President in his sick room, and the President spoke to him of the charges his enemies had made against him, and the efforts they were making to alienate his friends from him, and then mentioned that my colleague had charged him with saying about my other two colleagues, and the President said he never had made use of any such expressions about either of them: that the statement was false. Mr. D. said the gentleman from South Carolina had taken the facts stated by my colleague as undeniably true; and if he had remained silent and let the speech of the gentleman gone to the country as true, he would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, not only to the Executive, but to his country, for which his constituents would never have forgiven him. Mr. D. said he had done his duty, and would do it again under similar circumstances, disregarding the consequences to himself.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, Dec. 21, 1836.—on the Specie Circular.

The Senate having again proceeded to the order of the day, which was the consideration of the following resolutions, heretofore moved by Mr. Ewing of Ohio:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the Treasury order of the 11th day of July, anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, designating the funds which should be receivable in payment for public lands, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Resolved, also, That it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs, or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discrimination in the funds so receivable, between different individuals or between the different branches of the public revenue.

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The power of disposing of this important subject is in the hands of gentlemen, both here and elsewhere, who are not likely to be influenced by any opinions of mine. I have no motive, therefore, for addressing the Senate, but to discharge a public duty, and to fulfil the expectations of those who look to me for opposition, whether availing or unavailing, to whatever I believe to be illegal or injurious to the public interests. In both these respects, the Treasury order of the 11th of July appears to me objectionable. I think it not warranted by law, and I think it also practically prejudicial. I think it has contributed not a little to the pecuniary difficulties under which the whole country has been, and still is, laboring; and that its direct effect on one particular part of the country is still more decidedly and severely unfavorable.

The Treasury order, or Treasury circular, of the 11th of July last, is addressed by the Secretary to the receivers of public money, and to the deposit banks. It instructs these receivers and these banks, after the 15th day of August then next, to receive in payment of the public lands nothing except what is directed by existing laws, viz: gold and silver, and, in the proper cases, Virginia land scrip; provided, that till the 15th of December then next, the same indulgence heretofore extended, as to the kind of money received, may be continued, for any quantity of land not exceeding 320 acres, to each purchaser who is an actual settler or bona fide resident in the State where the sales are made.

The exception in favor of Virginia scrip is founded on a particular act of Congress, and makes no part of the general question. It is not necessary, therefore, to refer farther to that exception. The substance of the general instruction is, that nothing but gold and silver shall be received in payment for public lands; provided, however, that actual settlers and bona fide residents in the States where the sales are made may purchase in quantities not exceeding 320 acres each, and be allowed to pay as heretofore. But this provision was limited to the 15th day of December, which has now passed; so that, by virtue of this order, gold and silver are now required of all purchasers, and for all quantities.

I am very glad that a resolution to rescind this order has been thus early introduced; and I am glad, too, since the resolution is to be opposed, that opposition comes early, in a bold, unequivocal, and decided form. The order, it seems, is to be defended as being both legal and useful. Let its defence, then, be made.

The honorable member from Missouri (Mr. Benton) objects even to giving the resolution to rescind a second reading. He avails himself of his right, though it be not according to general practice, to arrest the progress of the measure at its first stage. This, at least, is open, bold, and manly warfare.

The honorable member, in his elaborate speech, founds his opposition to this resolution, and his support of the Treasury order, on those general principles respecting currency, which he is known to entertain, and which he has maintained for many years. His opinions some of us regard as altogether ultra and impracticable; looking to a state of things not desirable in itself, even if it were practicable, and, if it were desirable, as being far beyond the power of this Government to bring about.

The honorable member has manifested much perseverance, and abundant labor, most undoubtedly, in support of his opinions; he is understood, also, to have had countenance from high places; and what new hopes of success the present moment holds out to him, I am not able to judge, but we shall probably soon see. It is precisely on these general and long known opinions that he rests his support of the Treasury order. A question, therefore, is at once raised between the gentleman's principles and opinions, on the subject of the currency, and the principles and opinions which have generally prevailed in the country, and which are, and have been, entirely opposite to his. That question is now about to be put to the vote of the Senate. In the progress, and by the termination of this discussion, we shall learn whether the gentleman's sentiments are, or are not, to prevail, so far, at least, as the Senate is concerned. The country will rejoice, I am sure, to see some declaration of the opinions of Congress on a subject about which so much has been said, and which is so well calculated, by its perpetual agitation, to disquiet and disturb the confidence of society.

We are now fast approaching the day when one administration goes out of office, and another is to come in. The country has an interest in learning as soon as possible whether the new administration, while it receives the power and patronage, is to inherit, also, the topics, and the projects, of the past; whether it is to keep up the avowal of the same objects and the same schemes, especially in regard to the currency. The order of the Secretary is prospective, and, on the face of it, perpetual. Nothing in or about it gives it the least appearance of a temporary measure. On the contrary, its terms imply no limitation in point of duration, and the gradual manner in which it is to come into operation shows plainly an intention of making it the settled and permanent policy of Government. Indeed, it is but now beginning its complete existence. It is only five or six days since its full operation has commenced. Is it to stand, as the law of the land and the rule of the Treasury, under the administration which is to ensue? And are those notions of an exclusive specie currency, and opposition to all banks, on which it is defended, to be espoused and maintained by the new administration, as they have been by its predecessor? These are questions, not of mere curiosity, but of the highest interest to the whole country.

In considering this order, the first thing naturally is to look for the causes which led to it, or are assigned for its promulgation. And these, on the face of the order itself, are declared to be "complaints which have been made of frauds, speculations, and monopolies in the purchase of the public lands, and the aid which is said to be given to effect these objects by excessive bank credits, and dangerous, if not partial, facilities through bank drafts and bank deposits, and the general evil influence likely to result to the public interest, and especially the safety of the great amount of money in the Treasury, and the sound condition of the currency of the country, from the further exchange of the national domain in this manner, and chiefly for bank credits and paper money."
